PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 81st CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 7, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, again through sleep and darkness safely brought, restored to life and power and thought, we face a new day. Wilt Thou lift our duty above drudgery. Make us patient and considerate one with another in the fret and jar of human contacts, remembering that even in the glare of public gaze each fights a hard battle and walks a lonely way. Help us to make public life a pursuit of the best, and, casting aside all counsels of despair, press on with buoyant feet, firm in the faith that for ourselves, our Nation, and the world, the best is yet to be. Give us, O Master divine, a reverence for truth, a deep desire to think and speak and act truly, and a passion to hasten the day when the rule of justice and love shall engirdle the earth. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, June 13, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3181) to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7477) providing for the conveyance to the town of Nahant, Mass., of the Fort Ruckman Military Reservation; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. DAWSON, Mr. BONNER, and Mr. RICH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 1769) to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co., and it was signed by the Vice President.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for an indefinite period.

MEETING OF COMMITTEE DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was authorized to hold a hearing tomorrow at 2 o'clock, during the session of the Senate, for the purpose of considering nominations sent to the committee by the President.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Malone
Benton	Hickenlooper	Martin
Brewster	Hill	Maybank
Bricker	Hoey	Millikin
Bridges	Holland	Mundt
Butler	Humphrey	Murray

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM], and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] are absent on public business.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business, attending the sessions of the International Labor Organization at Geneva, Switzerland, as a delegate representing the United States.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, it would accommodate the committee in the consideration of the bill if Senators who have amendments to offer would, as soon as they can have them prepared, submit them to the Senate. If that is done, we will get a better idea of the length of time that may be required on the bill. I am merely making this as a suggestion.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat, I should like to advise him of a fact which he perhaps knows. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] advised me this morning that he was under the impression that the Senator from Georgia would leave for his home in Georgia today. I told him that was incorrect, that the Senator would probably leave tonight, that he would be present in the Senate today.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be here today and tomorrow. I shall not leave until tomorrow night, and I shall be back Monday. I thought that if the debate went on through Friday I could ask some other members of the committee to look after the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. I desired to advise the Senator with respect to the conversation I had with the Senator from Colorado, who indicated that he would be willing today to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill and all amendments starting on either Monday or Tuesday next.

Mr. GEORGE. We are working on the problem now with the distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr.

WHERRY], and we may have a proposal to make at a very early hour today.

Mr. LUCAS. I was not sure that the Senator had seen the Senator from Colorado; that was why I raised the question.

Mr. President, I desire to make a further statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement with respect to what happened yesterday before the Democratic policy committee, in order that all Senators may know in advance what the program will be.

The policy committee unanimously agreed that, following the disposition of H. R. 6000, the Senate would be asked to proceed to the consideration of House bill 6826, an act to provide for the common defense through the registration and classification of certain male persons, and for other purposes. It is the bill extending the draft, which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Armed Services.

I am not sure how long the consideration of that bill will take, but it will probably be 2 or 3 days. However, that measure will be the unfinished business following the disposition of the social-security bill.

It is my hope that by the time we dispose of the draft bill the Committee on Foreign Relations will have reported the bill dealing with the military-assistance program, and probably that bill will follow the disposition of the extension-of-the-draft measure.

I should also like to announce to the Senate that on the 10th day of July a motion will be made to proceed to the consideration of the Fair Employment Practice Commission bill. On the same day, in view of the fact that we had debate of about a week on the measure, we will also file a petition for cloture, which, under the rules of the Senate, will bring about a vote on cloture on Wednesday, July 12.

I trust that all Senators will make note of those two dates, especially the date of July 12, in order that they may be present, and we may get all the votes possible, with the hope that 64 affirmative votes may be recorded at that time on the motion for cloture.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator wish to have routine matters considered at this time?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senators be permitted to submit petitions and memorials, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and present matters for the RECORD, without debate and without speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GALLUP-DURANGO HIGHWAY AND GALLUP-WINDOW ROCK HIGHWAY AT NAVAJO INDIAN RESERVATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal certain legislation relating to the Gallup-Durango Highway and the Gallup-Window Rock Highway at the Navajo Indian Reservation, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following reports of a committee were submitted:

By Mr. MAGNUSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

S. 2484. A bill to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to provide war-risk and certain marine and liability insurance; with amendments (Rept. No. 1828);

S. 2786. A bill to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, to further promote the development and maintenance of the American merchant marine, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 1829);

S. 2801. A bill to give effect to the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, signed at Washington under date of February 8, 1949, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 1830);

S. 3109. A bill to aid the development and maintenance of American-flag shipping on the Great Lakes, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 1831);

S. 3244. A bill to give effect to the certification of ships' cooks convention, 1946, adopted at the tweny-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization, held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946; with amendments (Rept. No. 1832);

S. 3245. A bill to give effect to the medical examination (seafarers) convention, 1946, adopted at the twenty-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization, held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946; without amendment (Rept. No. 1833);

S. 3246. A bill to give effect to the food and catering (ships' crews) convention, 1946, adopted at the twenty-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization, held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946; with amendments (Rept. No. 1834); and

S. 3687. A bill to require the armed services to utilize private American shipping services for the overseas transportation of commodities and civilian personnel; with amendments (Rept. No. 1835).

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON REDUCTION OF NONESSENTIAL FEDERAL EXPENDITURES RELATING TO PERSONNEL AND PAY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures, I submit an additional report on civilian employment in the executive branch of the Federal Government for the month of April 1950, and in accordance with the practice of several years' standing, I request that it be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks, together with a statement by me.

There being no objection, the report and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL PERSONNEL IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH, MARCH-APRIL 1950, AND PAY, FEBRUARY-MARCH 1950

NOTE WITH REFERENCE TO PERSONAL SERVICE EXPENDITURE FIGURES

It should be noted that the latest expenditure figures for personal service shown in table I of this report are for the month of March and that they are compared with personal service expenditure figures for the month of February, whereas the latest employment figures covered in this report are for the month of April and are compared with the month of March. This lag in personal service expenditure figures is necessary in order that actual expenditures may be reported.

(Figures in the following report are compiled from signed official personnel reports by the various agencies and departments of the Federal Government. Table I shows total personnel employed inside and outside continental United States, and pay, by agency. Table II shows personnel employed inside continental United States. Table III shows personnel employed outside continental United States. Table IV gives by agency the industrial workers employed by the Federal Government. For purposes of comparison figures for the previous month are shown in adjoining columns.)

PERSONNEL AND PAY SUMMARY

(See table I)

According to monthly personnel reports for April 1950 submitted to the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures:

Agency	Civilian personnel in executive branch			Payroll (in thousands of dollars) in executive branch
	In April numbered	In March numbered	Increase (+) or decrease (−)	In March was—	In February was—	Increase (+) or decrease (−)
Total	2,093,312	2,091,895	+1,417	$572,511	$510,174	+$62,337
1. Agencies exclusive of National Military Establishment [1]	1,348,293	1,349,054	−761	355,173	319,358	+35,815
2. National Military Establishment	745,019	742,841	+2,178	217,338	190,816	+26,522
Within the National Military Establishment:
Office of the Secretary of Defense	1,755	1,755		748	636	+112
Department of the Army	300,359	298,351	+2,008	81,993	76,560	+5,433
Department of the Air Force	150,803	149,586	+1,217	41,531	36,971	+4,560
Department of the Navy	292,102	293,149	−1,047	93,066	76,649	+16,417

[1] Includes Department of Commerce employees (enumerators, supervisors, and clerks) engaged in taking the Seventeenth Decennial Census as follows: March, 145,055; April, 147,264.

Table I breaks down the above figures on employment and pay by agency.

Tables II, III, and IV break down the above employment figures to show the number inside continental United States, outside continental United States, and the number in the so-called industrial categories. This further break-down in tables II, III, and IV does not include pay figures because payroll reports submitted to the committee by some agencies are inadequate for this purpose.

MUTUAL DEFENSE ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Table V shows personnel counted in tables I, II, III, and IV who are assigned to the mutual defense assistance program by the State Department, Economic Cooperation Administration, and the component units of the National Military Establishment together with their pay.

TABLE I.—Consolidated table of Federal personnel inside and outside continental United States employed by the executive agencies during April 1950, and comparison with March 1950; and pay for March 1950 and comparison with February 1950

STATEMENT BY SENATOR BYRD

Federal civilian employment in the executive branch during the month of April totaled 2,093,312. The increase was 1,417 over the March total of 2,091,895.

Seasonal increases were reported by the Departments of Agriculture and Interior, and there was another substantial increase in the Department of Commerce, chiefly in the Bureau of the Census. Personnel assigned to the mutual defense assistance program continued to increase, and employment by the Housing and Home Finance Agency was up again for the ninth consecutive month.

Two significant decreases were reported during April; one was the second consecutive monthly drop by the Post Office Department, and the other was the second consecutive reduction by the Veterans' Administration.

Civilian personnel assigned to the MDAP in April totaled 9,567, an increase of 3,703 over March. To date employees have been assigned to MDAP as follows: 6,601 from the Army, 2,167 from the Navy, 632 from the Air Force, 120 by the State Department, 35 by the Office of the Secretary of Defense, and 12 by the Economic Cooperation Administration.

The Housing and Home Finance Agency employment increased 203 during April, continuing its steady increase for nine consecutive months since last July. The increase was 25 in August, 101 in September, 245 in October, 259 in November, 232 in December, 263 in January, 197 in February, and 237 in March—a 9-month increase of 1,762. April employment by the Agency totaled 13,019.

After reaching an all-time peak of 513,192 in February, following 11 successive monthly increases totaling 14,856, the Post Office Department now has reported decreases for two consecutive months totaling 3,165. Post Office employment in April was 510,727. Most of these reductions were made prior to the effective date of the Postmaster General's order curtailing mail deliveries.

April was the second consecutive month in which the Veterans' Administration reported decreases. Since reaching a total of 196,436 in February, Veterans' Administration personnel has been reduced by a total of 5,409—2,161 in March and 3,248 in April. This decrease has been due largely to the fact that the peak requirement of the veterans' insurance refund program has been passed. The Administration's employment in April was 191,027.

These observations on Federal civilian employment are based on signed monthly reports by executive agencies compiled today by the Joint Committee on Reduction of Nonessential Federal Expenditures.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, June 14, 1950, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 1769) to reimburse the Stebbins Construction Co.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLANDERS:

S. 3758. A bill to provide that, in the application of reduction-in-force regulations promulgated under section 12 of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 to positions of locomotive engineer, service performed in other civilian positions shall be disregarded; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. IVES:

S. 3759. A bill to provide for the admission to the United States of an additional number of aliens of Italian nationality; and

S. 3760. A bill for the relief of Ibrahim Moise Chammah; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LODGE:

S. 3761. A bill to exempt the personal property of certain veterans' organizations from the District of Columbia personal property tax; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 3762. A bill to amend the act of August 1, 1949, relating to the lending of certain property to national veterans' organizations by the Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force; to the Committee on Armed Services.

S. 3763. A bill to authorize the printing as separate House documents of the proceedings of the national conventions or national encampments of certain additional veterans' organizations; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

S. 3764. A bill to permit the appointment to the position of senior specialist in the Legislative Reference Service of retired officers of the armed services without loss of pensions and other benefits, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

S. 3765. A bill to amend chapter 61 (relating to lotteries) of title 18, United States Code, to make clear that such chapter does not apply to contests wherein prizes are awarded for the specie, size, weight, or quality of fish caught by the contestant; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LEHMAN:

S. 3766. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Stanislawa Kilawska; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 3767 A bill for the relief of Israel Ratsprecher and Maryse Ratsprecher; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

S. 3768. A bill to authorize payments by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs on the purchase of automobiles or other conveyances by certain disabled veterans, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

By Mr. GURNEY:

S. 3769. A bill authorizing the issuance of a patent in fee to Leona Ann Leighton Grablander; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

S. 3770. A bill to amend section 705 of title 18 of the United States Code relating to unauthorized reproduction of badges and medals of veterans' organizations; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAGNUSON:

S. 3771. A bill to provide transportation on Canadian vessels between Skagway, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, between Haines, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, and between Hyder, Alaska, and other points in Alaska or the continental United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HOEY:

S. 3772. A bill for the relief of Chiyako Ozama; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INVESTIGATION OF TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT IN BOSTON POSTAL DISTRICT OF CERTAIN TEMPORARY WAR VETERANS

Mr. LODGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 297), which was referred to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of the termination of employment in the Boston postal district of some 800 disabled veterans of World War II classed as "continuous temporary," who had entered employment as clerks, carriers, and mail handlers after passing a civil-service examination, had established a service-connected disability of 10 percent or more, and had performed the regular work of said postal district for periods of 3 and 4 years under such classification up to April 10, 1950, including but not limited to—

(1) the extent to which authorized persons had promised these "continuous temporaries" permanent employment and a civil-service status;

(2) the extent to which civil-service laws and regulations have been violated or evaded in the termination of their employment; and

(3) the extent to which civil-service laws and regulations have been violated or evaded by the practice of the Boston postal district in keeping a large portion of the necessary work force on a temporary basis for a period of years rather than setting up the positions on a permanent basis as required by the normal workload.

SEC. 2. The committee shall report its findings, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable, to the Senate at the earliest practicable date.

SEC. 3. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to employ upon a temporary basis such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION HOSPITALS—AMENDMENT

Mr. IVES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 5965) to provide for the construction of certain Veterans' Administration hospitals, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL-AID ROAD ACT—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MAYBANK submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3424) to amend and supplement the Federal-Aid Road Act approved July 11, 1916 (39 Stat. 355), as amended and supplemented, to authorize appropriations for continuing the construction of highways, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Public Works and ordered to be printed.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950—AMENDMENTS

Mr. LEHMAN (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. DOUGLAS) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance System, to amend the public assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LEHMAN (for himself and Mr. MURRAY) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 6000, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LEHMAN (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. HUMPHREY) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 6000, supra, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. LEHMAN (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. HUMPHREY, and Mr. DOUGLAS) submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to House bill 6000, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BENTON AT UNESCO GENERAL CONFERENCE AT FLORENCE, ITALY

[Mr. FLANDERS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Senator BENTON at the fifth session of the General Conference of UNESCO, at Florence, Italy, on June 6, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

CITATION BY THE UNIVERSITY OF WYOMING ON THE OCCASION OF THE PRESENTATION TO SENATOR HUNT OF AN HONORARY DOCTOR OF LAWS DEGREE

[Mr. SCHOEPPEL asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the citation by the University of Wyoming on the occasion of the presentation to Senator HUNT of an honorary doctor of laws degree, which appears in the Appendix.]

PLIGHT OF THE DAIRY FARMERS—LETTER FROM CARL K. PETERS

[Mr. LEHMAN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by him from Carl K. Peters, president of the St. Lawrence County unit of the Farmers' Union, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE GOVERNMENT POTATO PROGRAM—LETTER FROM THE POTATO GROWERS OF WISCONSIN, INC.

[Mr. MCCARTHY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a letter received by him from the Potato Growers of Wisconsin, Inc., which appears in the Appendix.]

IN BEHALF OF SENATOR MCCARTHY—EDITORIAL FROM THE BRIDGEPORT POST

[Mr. MCCARTHY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "In Behalf of Senator MCCARTHY," published in the Bridgeport Post for June 7, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

A COMMITTEEMAN WRITES ABOUT PMA

[Mr. HUMPHREY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "A Committeeman Writes About PMA," written by Miles A. Nelson, county committeeman, Itasca County, Minn., and published in the Farmer's Union Herald of June 5, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

THE CRITICAL FARM SITUATION IN WISCONSIN

[In accordance with the authority granted Mr. WILEY on June 2, 1950 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 7980), there was submitted for Mr. WILEY today a statement prepared by him on the critical farm situation in Wisconsin, which appears in the Appendix.]

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. LEHMAN was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate for the remainder of the day in order to go to New York to address a gathering this evening.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WILLIAMS was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of today and tomorrow, in order to attend the Del-Mar-Va chicken festival.

Mr. DARBY. Mr. President, it is necessary for me to get some information relative to the raising of chickens in Kansas, by going to Delaware tomorrow to attend the Del-Mar-Va chicken festival. I ask unanimous consent to be absent for that purpose.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the request be repeated, please?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has said that it is necessary for him to attend the chicken festival in Delaware tomorrow, in order to obtain some information for the chicken raisers in Kansas.

Mr. LUCAS. Then I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, leave is granted.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. LANGER was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate from Thursday, June 15 until Tuesday, June 27.

CERTAIN BENEFITS TO ANNUITANTS WHO RETIRED PRIOR TO APRIL 1, 1948

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4295) to provide certain benefits for annuitants who retired under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, prior to April 1, 1948, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. NEELY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from West Virginia moved that the Senate insist upon its amendments?

Mr. NEELY. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. FREAR, and Mr. LANGER conferees on the part of the Senate.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE ECA PROGRAM

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of the Senate while I discuss and ask to have inserted in the RECORD certain matters coming from the so-called watch-dog committee of the House and Senate. I shall require about 2½ minutes to present each of two matters for the RECORD, if I may have unanimous consent to occupy that time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, since the beginning of the ECA program the matter of marine insurance in the program has been one of considerable concern to the industry of this country. In the early days of the program, ECA provided funds to cover marine insurance on shipments abroad. Some months later the Administrator changed this policy and announced that he would no longer allocate dollars for the payment of marine-insurance premiums. Many protests were raised by the industry, and these protests were forcibly called to the attention of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation. The staff of the joint committee made a study of the matter and prepared a report on the situation last year. After this report was prepared, the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation held hearings at which members of the insurance industry and officials of the ECA appeared and testified with respect to the ECA policy.

As a result of these hearings and the studies made by the staff of the joint committee, I submitted an amendment to the ECA extension authorization last year which was adopted by the Senate and finally passed the Congress in a revised form. This amendment provided that the ECA Administrator should provide dollar funds for the payment of insurance premiums on commodities purchased in the United States where such insurance was placed on a competitive basis in accordance with normal trade practices prevailing prior to the outbreak of World War II.

Subsequent to the passage of this legislation, the ECA issued a revised regulation which was supposed to give effect to the change in the law. I do not think the regulation gave full implementation to the intent of Congress in enacting the amendment to which I have referred. On July 18 of last year I wrote the Administrator of the ECA, pointing out my objection to the revised amendment issued by the ECA and he replied under date of July 26 in a letter which I do not consider satisfactory. Since that time, I continue to receive, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, protests from the insurance industry pointing out the fact that the American industry is being discriminated against in the countries we are furnishing aid under the ECA program.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the report to which I have referred, as well as the exchange of letters between myself and Mr. Hoffman, printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE ECA PROGRAM

CHANGE IN ECA POLICY

On September 13, 1948, ECA announced that it would no longer allocate dollars for the payment of marine-insurance premiums. Its statement was as follows:

"WASHINGTON, September 13.—In a further move to emphasize private trade practices in the ECA operations as directed by Congress, Paul G. Hoffman, Economic Cooperation Administrator, announced today that no ECA funds will be allocated in the future to cover the cost of insurance premiums for ECA-financed cargoes. In the future insurance for cargoes will be handled by the exporter and importer as they desire, similar to export-import procedures that have prevailed in private trade transactions.

"New procurement authorizations will not carry allocation of ECA funds for insurance premiums, but use of such funds authorized in past procurement authorizations will be honored, Hoffman said.

"The new ECA policy on insurance premiums is based on the belief that such ECA funds as might be required for insurance premiums could better be used for projects more closely related to the main ECA objective of recovery in the participating nations. This new policy is threefold:

"1. ECA will not finance insurance payments directly or indirectly. Losses of shipments will be regarded as a program expense and will require counterpart deposits by the country in local currency.

"2. Participating countries or their importers may insure as they desire, using any currency they choose for payment of premiums. ECA will not decide whether cargoes should or should not be insured.

"3. In the event of losses, no adjustment will be made in the local currency counterpart funds of the participating countries.

"Hoffman said that administrative as well as legal and economic considerations pointed to the wisdom of avoiding ECA involvement in insurance financing."

Under this shift in policy the premium on insurance during transportation from factory to shipside is still absorbed by ECA as a part of the seller's price on sales f. a. s. (free at shipside), but insurance during transportation from American wharf to Europe is not so absorbed. The protest of the marine-insurance industry against this decision of ECA is directed to the point that ECA's theory of fostering private channels of trade cannot be realized in practice so long as foreign governments control foreign trade through currency controls. Such controls permit foreign governments to order their nationals to procure insurance in their own national markets and, necessarily, in their own currencies since no dollars will be released for the payment of premiums. Such a directive, issued by the French insurance syndicate, will be found in appendix I.

The reasoning of ECA by which it justifies its change in policy will be found in a report to its advisory committee on insurance, appendix II, page 5. Two marine-insurance associations have filed with the staff a memorandum setting forth the answer of the industry to the points made by ECA. Briefly, the two positions are as follows:

ECA POSITION AND REPLY OF THE INDUSTRY

1. ECA: If it finances the payment of premiums, it must satisfy itself that the insurance is of the appropriate kind and amount and that claims are vigorously prosecuted, which will require installation of checking points, legal review of specific transactions, study of rates. This will make necessary a considerable organization.

Industry: The industry already has established practices and rates which will make unnecessary most of the difficulty ECA envisages. Commercial banks now customarily assume responsibility in ordinary commercial transactions.

2. ECA: Programing difficulties will result whether (1) recipient countries retain all collections, resulting in their having free dollars, or (2) insurance collections are returned to the general funds of ECA, in which event no one will have any interest in prosecuting the claim except ECA, or (3) the collections are credited either in dollars or goods to the participating country.

Industry: The consignee who has deposited local currency in the counterpart fund will have an interest in prosecuting claims because he cannot receive back his deposit until the claim has been paid. If all losses are payable to ECA for the account of whom it may concern, the participating country can be notified that it is entitled to a replacement or a substitution.

3. ECA: A program such as that administered by ECA cannot be insured because the proceeds cannot restore damages and the bulk of losses will probably occur in small quantities in a large number of transactions so that, unless all-purpose coverage is utilized, ECA will not be protected for the larger amount of its potential losses.

Industry: Additional expenses of all risk insurance are reflected in additional loss recoveries and the net cost to ECA of either type of insurance should not substantially differ.

4. ECA: In all probability, more may be paid in premiums than is received in benefits to ECA.

Industry: That is undoubtedly true but permitting American marine-insurance companies to profit from doing business is not inconsistent with the practice of ECA in permitting other commercial concerns to obtain a profit from rendering a necessary service.

5. ECA: It should be emphasized that insurance is a private matter to be considered by parties directly concerned and ECA should do nothing to interfere with the placing of such insurance.

Industry: Insurance is not left as a private matter to be considered by the parties directly concerned, but the net result of ECA's decision has been a rapid and complete movement away from the utilization of private channels of trade in the insurance field and this move has been enforced by regulations of foreign governments.

6. ECA: Local currency funds should not be affected by losses, because such a procedure is administratively the simplest. Payments in local currency may be regarded as a fair assumption by participating countries of their pro rata share of program costs and of the real economic costs generally borne by the United States economy. Such local currency payments may be regarded as restitution to ECA for "lost" dollars and the foreign country is in a position similar to ECA, that is, it generally has the same interest or lack of it in insurance.

Industry: In order to protect himself the consignee must purchase insurance payable in his local currency. As a net result, marine insurance has been forced out of the American market into foreign markets.

COMMENT

There are four entities involved in an ECA financed transaction—ECA itself, a foreign government, a foreign importer, and an American exporter.

The American exporter has no interest in insurance beyond the time when delivery is made of the merchandise, title passes, and he becomes entitled to his money. He is customarily covered by insurance up to this time and the premium is added to the cost of the merchandise delivered.

The foreign importer has deposited in the counterpart fund the local currency equivalent of the dollar cost of his shipment, and he will be made whole financially if, in the event of loss, the amount of his deposit in local currency is returned to him through insurance. Under the recovery aspect of the ECA program, however, his interest would not seem to be merely in being made whole financially—he needs a replacement of the lost shipment. This can only be obtained with dollars.

The foreign government, in the event of a loss, finds itself in this position—its program has been charged by ECA with the shipment and its national economy is in need of a replacement. It has retained the local currency deposited by its importer, but that cannot be used to purchase the replacement. Dollars are required for this. If its needs or requirements have been either accurately estimated or underestimated in the program, it must necessarily either do without a needed replacement or resort to its free dollars for the cost of the replacement. The former course will in theory be a drag on recovery, and the latter course, under the dollar deficit theory, will not result in relieving ECA of the burden of financing the replacement, but will merely shift the expense from one annual program to the next.

ECA may regard itself as sufficiently large to be a self-insurer, and it undoubtedly is, but unless it sets up a reserve fund sufficiently large to take care of all anticipated losses, it will necessarily find itself in the position of having allocated all of its available funds to specific programs. In the event of a loss, it will then not be able to finance a replacement except by taking the money out of some other part of the program.

It seems apparent that describing a loss as "a program expense" will not supply the dollars required to finance a replacement. This must be done by an appropriation of funds sufficient in amount to pay either the cost of replacements or the premium on insurance to cover losses. In a program as large as that of ECA, the latter will doubtless be the larger amount.

This brings up for consideration the situation in which the American marine-insurance industry now finds itself. Congress has already expressed in several statutes its desire to foster the growth of this industry as a contributor to the strength of the United States merchant marine.[1] The functioning of this industry requires a considerable organization, such as underwriters, brokers, claim adjusters, inspectors, engineers, and former sea captains skilled in packing and stowage. Such an organization, once dispersed, cannot soon be reassembled. To support such an organization and at the same time furnish insurance at reasonable rates requires an extensive business and a broad coverage of risks, including cargoes as well as hulls. The elimination of American insurance companies from the business of covering ECA-financed shipments may have serious results in both particulars.

The result of such a directive as that issued by the French is to disrupt the customary commercial practice under which insurance is bought from warehouse to warehouse and is procured by whoever finances the trade.

The mere elimination of such directives would not appear to be a very effective remedy. The real control which foreign governments have over the placement of insurance is through their control over exchange. Unless dollars are released, their nationals cannot obtain dollar insurance, except possibly from English companies which may be adequately supplied with dollars and which might, in particular instances, be willing to receive Continental currencies in payment of premiums. Thus, the real issue is the desirability of assisting United States marine-insurance companies as a force supporting the American merchant marine.

While the marine-insurance industry states that it desires merely freedom to compete, this freedom would not seem pregnant with results unless dollars are made available, through ECA, to the foreign customers of American insurance companies.

Legislative action does not seem to be required, but may be desirable. If and when ECA concludes that its present policy is not encouraging private channels of trade, but, on the contrary, is encouraging and making effective control by foreign governments of the marine-insurance business, ECA may by administrative action return the situation to its status prior to September 13, 1948.

APPENDIX I

SYNDICATE OF MARINE INSURANCE COMPANIES,
Paris, September 6, 1948.

III. Circular Letter No. 605.

Object: Marshall plan.

The presidency informs its colleagues that, for a number of weeks already, it has been worried about the application of certain clauses of the Marshall plan, which seem to deprive the European insurance markets of the insurance of the goods imported under this plan.

In full agreement with the insurance direction, our presidency has gotten in contact with various French administrations.

On the other hand, in order to coordinate the efforts of the European markets all placed in the same position, it has also had interesting conversations with the representatives of the various foreign markets.

The results obtained are not yet definite, but already the direction of foreign exchange which had transmitted a note on this problem to the French mission in the United States has received a notice according to which the American authorities would not object to the insurance being covered in the French market.

The direction of foreign exchange, in full agreement with the insurance direction and upon our request, had in the past instructed all French importers to insure all goods purchased, thanks to the interim aid, on an f. o. b. basis and not on a c. i. f. basis. In this way up to now the French market has had the benefit of the insurance of the imports.

A new circular letter is addressed to all French importers instructing them to refuse to buy on a c. i. f. basis the goods imported in application of the Marshall plan.

The insurance direction which has just informed us of this news, requests us to notify them of the cases which have come to our attention in which these instructions of the Foreign Exchange Direction have not been followed.

It would, therefore, be advisable that the insurance carriers of our market, in particular the insurers of the groupements policies, get in touch with the assured, through the intermediary of the brokers, in order to attract their attention to this point.

The presidency will receive with interest any communications made in this connection.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE REPORT

We have studied the problem of ECA financing of insurance and submit for consideration the following recommendations:

A. ECA should not finance insurance payments, either directly or indirectly.

B. Loss of ECA-financed shipments should be treated simply as a direct program expense. ECA responsibility should extend only to the consideration of such losses in terms of its regular program operations covering—

1. Stabilization or destabilization effects on the domestic economy.

2. Requirements of foreign rehabilitation and reconstruction.

C. ECA should emphasize that payment, administration, and collection of insurance is a private matter to be undertaken at the discretion of parties directly concerned with negotiating contracts for the purchase, sale, and shipment of goods.

D. No refund or other adjustment in local currency funds should be made for lost or damaged cargo, whether insured or not.

OUTLINE JUSTIFICATION FOR RECOMMENDATIONS

The reasons for the above recommendations are as follows:

A. Administrative and legal expense and difficulties

1. If ECA were to finance payment of insurance premiums, it would have to take adequate precautions to satisfy itself that the insurance in each transaction was of the appropriate kind and amount, and that claims for damages were satisfactorily administered and vigorously and quickly settled. This would require—

(a) Installation of checking points at strategic places. (Such checking points would be even more essential where questions of split insurance—e. g., marine and inland insurance handled by different carriers—were involved.)

(b) Institution of legal review of specific transactions. At the minimum, ECA would be required to satisfy itself that its interests were protected.

(c) Extension of the present review process in order to analyze rates, types, and extent of coverage.

2. Such financing would require additional time and study for the evolution of a reasonably uniform and sensible policy. For example, additional study would be required for such questions as the extent and type of coverage to be secured, in general, and for particular types of commodities, or geographical areas—e. g., should insurance extend from the producer's warehouse to the point of final consumption? Should it cover only marine risk, and, if so, what type?

3. Such financing would create programing difficulties. One of the three following choices would have to be made, all of which involve certain difficulties in programing:

(a) Allow recipient countries to retain all collections of insurance benefits. Such a course would be of doubtful legal validity and inadvisable politically. It would provide an avenue for the gift of "free" dollars.

(b) Insist that all payments of insurance benefits be returned to the general funds of ECA. Under this approach, no incentive would be provided for vigorous prosecution of claims and complete protection of ECA interests—unless ECA were itself to administer such claims. It is unreasonable to expect that the participating countries should grant high administrative priority to the protection of interests which may or may not redound directly to their individual benefit.

(c) Credit the resources so received to the direct account of the affected country. This might be accomplished in either of two ways:

(i) By crediting dollars to the account of such country. Good faith on the part of ECA would then require that it close its eyes in future programing to a portion of already available dollars. Two things seem clear: (1) It might be difficult to convince the affected country that such an extraordinary requirement would be faithfully adhered to, and (2) it does not make good economic sense to ignore the availability of such dollars where relative allocations are involved.

(ii) By crediting identical goods to the account of the participating country. Since time would undoubtedly elapse between loss and restitution of claims, it seems unwise for ECA to bind itself in this fashion. During the intervening time, both domestic and foreign economic conditions are almost certan to undergo important alterations.

4. Conclusion: In view of the above considerations, it seems administratively simpler and cheaper for ECA to assume the risk rather than to involve itself in insurance, through direct or indirect financing. It should confine itself to distributing such losses, as they are reported, in terms of its domestic and foreign responsibilities. This can and should be done within the normal routine of programing operations. Neither additional staff nor procedures should then be necessary.

B. Economic considerations

1. The economic considerations are of two kinds: (1) Monetary considerations, and (2) real economic costs in terms of goods and services. Of the two, the latter is more important and will be treated first.

(a) Real economic costs: In terms of real goods and services, a program such as that administered by ECA cannot be insured. At best, insurance can return dollars for real goods and services. It cannot restore damages. From the point of view of a total economy, insurance is not a matter of reducing costs arising through loss, spoilage, diversion, etc.; it is a matter of distributing the burden more equitably. This is the cardinal principle of insurance. Each individual who insures assumes a small but certain loss (the premium) in order to avoid the possibility of a large but uncertain loss. In general, the larger the group of participants, the more certain do the calculations become and the more equitably can the burden be distributed. This leads to two further considerations:

(i) Insofar as ECA cargo is insured, the principles of good insurance will be reversed. The burden will be shifted from a broader group (the general public) to a narrower group (private insurance carriers).

(ii) The bulk of ECA losses will most probably occur in small quantities over a large number of transactions instead of large losses concentrated in a few transactions. Unless ECA intends to utilize expensive all-purpose coverage, it will not be protected for the larger amount of its potential losses.

(b) Monetary considerations: Three possible cases may arise:

(i) More may be paid in premiums than is received in benefits by ECA. This, the most likely eventuality, would mean that dollars which should have been devoted to European recovery would be diverted to other purposes.

(ii) Exactly equal amounts would be paid in premiums and received in benefits. Such an operation would be pointless. Dollars paid at one point of time would be restored at another. (To these considerations should, however, be added the additional administrative costs—in both real economic and monetary terms—which would be incurred by ECA and the insurance companies.)

(iii) More would be received in benefits than is paid in premiums. As noted above, this would reverse the principles of good insurance; the burden would be shifted from a larger to a smaller group.

2. Conclusion: Economic considerations reinforce administrative considerations leading to a policy of nonfinancing of insurance by ECA.

C. Relations between participating countries and their nationals

1. As noted in recommendation two, ECA should emphasize that insurance is a private matter to be considered by parties directly concerned with the details of contract negotiation and administration. It should do nothing to interfere with the placing of such insurance since it is obviously sensible for private individuals, under certain conditions, to insure. Moreover, the governments of the individual countries should be left to their own devices. Good insurance merely requires that the individual be restored to his initial position (minus the premium) after the loss. If such an individual were required to insure in his local currency and then were repaid in such currency this principle of insurance would be fulfilled. If he is permitted to insure in other currencies, ECA should not interfere, other than to take such currency availabilities into account in its regular programing operations. (From the point of view of the total program, such premiums and benefits, at fair rates, may be expected approximately to cancel out.) Nothing in this paragraph or in this memorandum should be interpreted, however, as advocating ECA's abandonment of its responsibilities for moving as rapidly as possible toward full utilization of private channels of trade and away from government regulation and interference in private transactions.

D. Local currency funds

1. Local currency funds should be left unaltered by losses incident to program operations for a variety of reasons. First, it is administratively much the simplest course. Second, such payments may be regarded as a fair assumption of burden by participating countries as a pro-rata share of program costs. Third, the real economic costs will generally be borne by the United States economy and such currency payments may be regarded as restitution—to ECA for "lost" dollars, and to the United States economy for real economic losses. Fourth, these funds are to be used in any event for the general purposes of economic reconstruction. Fifth, the participating countries are themselves in a position similar to ECA. They generally have the same interest in insurance, or lack of it. Private individuals may protect themselves or not—at their peril—either with their government, or with private insurance companies. The governments, like ECA, cannot or should not interest themselves in particular individuals, since their responsibility is in the direction of general, rather than particular welfare. Whether such governments allow their private citizens to insure in foreign currencies should, as noted above, be subject only to general ECA surveillance in the course of normal programing operations.

E. Comments on present ECA policy

1. It is our understanding that ECA now reimburses for insurance premiums only on c. i. f. shipments. Such reimbursements should be abandoned because (a) partial participation in insurance requires almost an equivalent amount of administrative complexity and expense as does total participation and (b) such an inconsistency in policy will be awkward to explain. We realize that certain mechanical difficulties may be involved, particularly with respect to so-called private self-insurers. Even in such cases, however, it will sometimes be possible to isolate the insurance component of price. In any event, the adoption of such a policy by ECA will free the hands of the participating country and encourage more careful procurement negotiations.

F. Assistance to American insurance interests

1. It has been brought to our attention that American marine-insurance companies are seeking the aid of ECA in the correction of certain practices which have affected their interests. These practices which have arisen since the outbreak of war are of two kinds: (1) Intervention, in foreign-trade transactions, by governments which act as "self-insurers"—that is, assume the risk themselves—and (2) attempts by certain of these governments to promote the growth of their own domestic insurance companies. While recommendations concerning this problem are beyond the scope of the committee, we would like to suggest that long-range protection to American insurance interests—as in the case of other industries—may best be secured by progress toward the general resumption of private activities in the field of foreign trade rather than by diversion of ECA resources to the immediate requirements of the industry. As we have emphasized above, ECA should not, in any event, do anything to interfere with private placement of insurance in any country with any company.

At present, there is a great deal of agitation and uncertainty concerning ECA policy toward insurance. Dilatoriness on the part of ECA is both unfair and dangerous. The companies and the countries have a right to a clear and forthright statement of policy as soon as possible.

JULY 18, 1949.

Hon. PAUL G. HOFFMAN,
Administrator, Economic Cooperation Administration, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: ECA Regulation No. 1, amendment 1, effective July 9, 1949, issued by the Economic Cooperation Administration, has come to my attention.

I note that under "Miscellaneous amendments, part 201.6," dealing with insurance, dollar payments of premiums for marine insurance on ECA-financed commodities procured in the United States will be eligible for financing under commodity procurement authorization if such insurance is "placed by the importer (or by the supplier or any other person if authorized so to do by the importer in a cable, written document, or the letter of credit)."

I presume the foregoing amendment was issued to conform to the legislative directive contained in Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress, which provides that "the Administrator shall, in providing assistance in the procurement of commodities in the United States, make available United States dollars for marine insurance on such commodities where such insurance is placed on a competive basis in accordance with normal trade practices prevailing prior to the outbreak of World War II."

You may recall that one of the significant problems with which the Congress was concerned in enacting the foregoing legislation, concerned the usual trade customs in the cotton industry. The evidence adduced by the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation indicated that the normal trade practice was for cotton exporters to provide insurance and to sell the commodity on a c. i. f. basis.

It does not appear that the language of the regulation would conform to the intent or to the letter of the amendment as passed by the Congress for it places upon any such transaction the additional qualification that the insurance must first be authorized by the participating country, and, second, must be placed by the importer or authorized by the importer in a cable, written document, or letter of credit.

It does not appear that the normal trade practices prevailing prior to the outbreak of World War II could be adhered to except by special permission of the participating government or the importer.

The intent of the act was that if the normal trade practice prior to World War II was to sell a commodity on a c. i. f. basis, and if the insurance in such a transaction is placed on a competitive basis, there is no need for the participating government or the importer to acquiesce by affirmative action in such an authorization.

I am of the opinion that the amendment, as issued, is an attempt by the Economic Cooperation Administration to follow the procedures and policies it had established prior to the enactment of the above-mentioned amendment to the Foreign Assistance Act.

I am at a loss to understand the reluctance of the ECA to comply with the intent and the letter of the law as it has been written by the Congress.

I would appreciate your comments upon this matter.

Kindest personal regards.

Sincerely,

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman.

ECONOMIC COOPERATION ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1949.

The Honorable PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: This is in reply to your letter of July 18, 1949, with respect to ECA regulation 1, amendment 1, effective July 9, 1949.

The rules contained in this amendment were written to give effect to the legislative directive in section 112 (j) of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended. One of these rules recognizes the responsibilities of participating countries to authorize the use of dollars for insurance premiums. This rule represents an application to marine insurance of the same procedures governing all commodities and services financed by ECA, namely that commodities and services required in the European recovery plan are to be determined initially by each participating country, subject to review by OEEC and finally by ECA.

You will appreciate that if ECA were to require the placement of dollar insurance on cargoes shipped from the United States, it would impose an obligation on participating countries of a new character entirely inconsistent with the general policy of the European recovery program.

Amendment 1 places the responsibility on the importer to exercise the business judgment involved in the question whether to insure the cargo in dollars, if permission is granted by his government, or in his local currency. The choice undoubtedly will be guided by the lower costs to him. That this decision should be left with the importer follows from the fact that risk of ownership is in the importer during the period of ocean shipment. Title and risk of ownership in the commodities passes to the importer when the exporter has completed delivery to the ocean carrier. At that time the exporter is paid and his interest in the commodity ceases except for possible claims arising out of nonperformance of the terms of the contract. In all regular f. a. s. and c. & f. sales, at the present time as well as prior to World War II, the risk of ownership during ocean shipment is borne by the importer. Practically all sales financed by ECA are made on the regular f. a. s., c. & f., or c. i. f. terms, which assures the exporter prompt payment upon delivery to the carrier. Under such circumstances it has always been a normal trade practice for the importer to decide whether to insure and the terms under which to insure.

When exports are made on a consignment basis, with sale and payment deferred, the exporter retains title during the period of shipment and does bear the risk. In such instances it is normal business usage for the exporter to make decisions as to the placing of insurance. Under the European recovery plan exports on consignment for cotton, or any other commodity, are virtually nonexistent.

Please be assured that full consideration was given to the intent of the Congress in drafting this amendment. I hope that this explanation has clarified for you the considerations which lie behind the specific provisions of the amendment.

Sincerely,

PAUL HOFFMAN,
Administrator.

EXPORT CONTROLS ON SHIPMENTS OF ARTICLES OF STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, we are constantly hearing reports that items similar to those which this country prohibits from being shipped to Russia and its satellites are nevertheless finding their way into those iron curtain countries. It is said that many of them are being shipped from or through certain western European nations—nations which are, after all, our allies. As chairman of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation I should like, therefore, to call to the attention of the Senate a report on this situation by the staff of the committee. A considerable part of the report deals with the role of Germany in east-west trade, and Mr. Paul Hoffman, Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration, wrote me he considers this part of the report "one of the most complete we have received." I believe that Members of the Senate will find that it sheds valuable light on a subject which has been too frequently obscured by fogs of misinformation, misunderstanding, and mischief.

Mr. President, this report by the staff of the "watchdog committee" makes it abundantly clear, it seems to me, that much of the restricted material which has gone to Russia and its satellites could have been prevented from going there if we had a simplified system of controls. Such a system would eliminate much of the administrative confusion and duplication regarding this important matter. Above all, as the report points out, it would eliminate some of our idiotic injunctions of secrecy with regard to the lists of restricted or prohibited items—unnecessary injunctions which have prevented representatives of the United States from taking the swift and effective action that is so necessary in these matters. There is still time for improvement, and it is my hope that this report may stimulate needed action.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the staff report, entitled "Staff Report Concerning Export Controls on Shipments of Articles of Strategic Importance and the Functioning of ECA Personnel in Connection Therewith," be incorporated in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STAFF REPORT TO THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN ECONOMIC COOPERATION CONCERNING EXPORT CONTROLS ON SHIPMENTS OF ARTICLES OF STRATEGIC IMPORTANCE AND THE FUNCTIONING OF ECA PERSONNEL IN CONNECTION THEREWITH

(Pursuant to sec. 124 of Public Law 472, 80th Cong.)

SCOPE OF THE INVESTIGATION

Beginning April 19 and ending June 15, 1949, agents of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation interviewed representatives of ECA, the Departments of State and Commerce, and military government and its agencies in France, Italy, Switzerland, Bizone, Austria, England, Holland, and Belgium. The controllers of the ECA country missions to Sweden, Denmark, and Trieste were interviewed in Paris or Rome. No representatives of foreign countries were interviewed except in England.

There are, in the files of the joint committee, reports with exhibits on each of the participating countries above named, giving in considerable detail the substance of what was said by the more than 70 individuals interviewed. These detailed reports, with the exhibits and a summary, were submitted to the Administrator of ECA for his examination and comment, which, in general, was that the "reports have been useful to our people in Washington," that the report covering "the situation in Germany is one of the most complete we have received," and that ECA agreed "with the majority of the conclusions reached."[1]

The summary, referred to above, contained this statement of the over-all conclusion reached:

"Performance by all departments and agencies has been insufficient and procedures inefficient."

In discussing wherein and why such was the fact, names of countries and individuals will be omitted because of the nature of the subject matter and for the additional reason that we are not here dealing, except in Bizone, with the question of the abilities of individuals as such. It is true that, in several countries, lapses on the part of individuals indicated a lack of the kind of attention to detail which the importance of the subject demanded, but, in the main, inadequate performance must be attributed almost entirely, not to individuals, but to the system under which they operated at that time.[2] It should be here stated that every assistance possible was rendered the agents of the joint committee in their investigation of the facts.

PART I. THE SECURITY PROBLEM

Departments and agencies principally concerned

The export of primary articles of warfare, such as arms and ammunition, is controlled by all countries and is not dealt with in this report.

In the United States, controls over other items of strategic importance, such as some machine tools and chemicals, are exercised by the Department of Commerce.[3] With respect to these other articles of strategic importance, with which this report concerns itself, the Department operates on the basis of two lists—I–A and I–B. Articles of considerable importance are on the I–A list and may not be exported under license to countries behind the iron curtain, but licenses will issue for export to other countries. This brings to attention the importance of the problem of the transit trade, which will be hereinafter discussed.

Articles on the I–B list, of lesser strategic importance, may be exported to countries behind the iron curtain if the quantity be not too great. A decision in this field is based upon judgment.

In order that the export policies of the participating countries and the United States might not work at cross-purposes, the United States Special Representative in Europe was chosen to negotiate with the participating countries, but in this he functions partly outside the framework of ECA. The East-West Trade Division of ECA also functions in this field.

The Department of the Army was in effect a participating country in the Bizone and it still performs important duties in Austria

[1] The entire letter of the Administrator to the chairman of the joint committee appears in the appendix to this report.

[2] Changes were subsequently made, and these will be referred to hereafter.

[3] For an explanation of these controls, see fourth quarterly report of the Secretary of Commerce, July 30, 1948, Export Control and Allocation Powers, particularly pp. 5–7, 12–16, 32–39.

and Trieste. The Department of State necessarily plays a large part in negotiations with the participating countries. Consequently, the investigation went beyond the boundaries of section 117 (d) of Public Law 472 (80th Cong.), which is of very limited scope. By it the Administrator is merely directed—

(a) To refuse delivery to participating countries of commodities which go into the production of articles for delivery to nonparticipating countries if a United States export license would be refused for such article; and

(b) To advise against the issuance of a United States export license for any article to such nonparticipating countries if he believes that the export of such article would be inconsistent with the provisions and purposes of title I of Public Law 472.

Section 117 (d) does not cover the following situations:

(1) Export from the United States to a Western Hemisphere country, whence the article is shipped to such a nonparticipating country;

(2) Export from a participating country direct to such a nonparticipating country when no component part of the article has been furnished through ECA aid;

(3) Export from one to another participating country, whence the article is shipped to such a nonparticipating country;

(4) Export from the United States or a participating country to another participating country for use in the importing country whence, however, a similar article from indigenous production is shipped to such a nonparticipating country, either directly or as in (3).

Of course, shipment of an item of strategic importance is just as dangerous to our own safety when made from or through a participating country as it is when made direct from the United States.

Progress in negotiations

By the end of March 1949, negotiations with the participating nations had produced little that was concrete except an "agreement in principle" which, as an ECA official stated, was easy to reach. Difficulties arose just so soon as details were brought into the discussion.

Although there is room for the opinion that the negotiations have taken an inordinate length of time, it is difficult to disagree with the position of ECA that (1) if action by the participating nation was to be effective, it was necessary that it be voluntary and based upon self-interest—that is, we are all in the same boat—and (2) that the alternative to policing by the participating nations themselves was for ECA to examine all of their export-control documents, for which it had neither the time, money, nor men.

Considerable progress has, however, been made since March, and a satisfactory solution to the problem should be forthcoming shortly, provided those things which remain to be done are handled promptly.

Secrecy

In the countries visited our representatives were unanimous in condemning the excessive secrecy which surrounded the subject of export controls over strategic items, and particularly the secrecy which surrounded the items on our I–A and I–B lists, but no one seemed able to get the system changed. Our lists had been made known to the governments of all of the participating countries and the feeling was that, with this broad distribution of knowledge, it was a practical certainty that iron-curtain countries had obtained a copy of the lists from somewhere.

The situation in the Bizone lent no support to any hope that our I–A and I–B lists had a shred of secrecy left. Both lists were in the hands of the German customs officials and of the detachment of United States Army personnel which worked with them. The large headquarters building in Frankfurt which houses most of the agencies of military government and ECA was anything but secure. There were guards at each of the numerous entrances, but with a constant stream of people going in and out, a guard could do no more than to see if a visitor had a pass or other paper which looked official—there was no time to find out if it really was official or belonged to the visitor.

At night the side doors were locked but an official of JEIA (Joint Export-Import Agency) stated that on several occasions when he had to go to his office after hours, he merely reached up to the sill over the door, got the key, and went in. Many offices were equipped with wooden file cases which were kept securely locked and barred in front, but to get into the case it was only necessary to turn the case around and take the back out with a penknife, which had been done in the office of this official the preceding December. Ingress and egress at night cannot have been too difficult when so many typewriters have been stolen that orders were issued to lock them to the radiators upon closing offices.

In the Bizone, export controls were operated according to country of destination and not according to the article exported, so refusal of a license for the export of an article to an iron-curtain country was, in effect, notice to that country that the article was on the list of prohibited exports.

One bad result of a program of secrecy is waste of information. Various departments and agencies, under instructions of secrecy, necessarily limit the number of men who exchange information and they keep information from other agencies. Thus the Department of Commerce had a list of 63 violations attributed to the participating countries together, but inquiry of our representatives in the countries visited invariably elicited the answer that they had never heard of such charges.

In some ECA missions military intelligence cooperated and in some it did not. In some ECA missions the controller, a very important individual in this field, was taken into the confidence of the east-west trade men and in some he was not, and in at least one mission he was specifically forbidden to cooperate in obtaining information.

During the visit to Europe of the agents of the joint committee, the situation with respect to the controllers was remedied and they now participate in this field. Since such visit the I–A and I–B lists have been downgraded from secret to confidential, but there seems to be no point to stopping there.

The United Kingdom has published its list of controlled article, which includes the articles on our I–A list minus some thirty-odd. Why should we not openly publish our list also?

The continuance of any degree of secrecy seems to serve no purpose except to deprive the United States of sources of information which would otherwise be available to it; that is, if some manufacturers in a country are selling war potential behind the iron curtain, there will be other manufacturers in the same line who will know about it and who, for patriotic reasons or because of trade jealousy, will report the facts. But at present, even if they see a shipment going out, they have no way of knowing that the matter should be reported. Also, secrecy results in attempts to sell when the merchant would not make such an attempt if informed that the article was on the prohibited list. As an example, in a participating country, the local agent of a manufacturer in the United States has a large order for a certain item and most of the customers are behind the iron curtain. Neither he nor his company can understand why the order cannot be shipped and much time has been consumed in handling this matter. It could all be settled very easily if someone would tell the manufacturer and his agent that the item in question is on the I–B list and the quantity is too great.

During the course of the investigation, in practically every country instances were discovered of lack of knowledge on the part of department and division heads of what was actually going on. Illustrative of this is a conversation in Paris on June 14 with the acting head of the East-West Trade Division in ECA, Washington, who stated in effect that up to May 1, ECA in Washington had been under the impression that everything in Europe was under control, at least on the basis of the British list (which is our I–A list minus thirty-odd items), but that the investigation by agents of the joint committee had uncovered many things which had not been known in Washington.

It may be here stated that nothing was discovered in Europe by agents of the joint committee which could not have been discovered by the responsible officers in the executive departments if they had left their offices and had made the necessary personal inspections of their respective departments or divisions, so that they could have seen for themselves what was being done, by whom, and how. The remedy for the situation found to exist is to revive and enforce the rule that a responsible officer does not shed responsibility merely by issuing an order to subordinates to implement a decision or to see to it that things are run efficiently.

On page 220 of the ECA Report on Recovery Progress and United States Aid (ECA Basic Document) it is stated that "the Administrator has supported east-west trade within the limits of national security."

The foundation upon which that statement rests is obviously reports made to the Administrator by subordinates, but the plain and simple fact is that the Administrator did not know, and had no way of finding out, whether or not that statement was warranted by existing conditions.

Many other instances were found where reliance had obviously been placed upon reports made by someone who also had made no personal inspection. The danger of relying upon such reports is illustrated by the second part of the above conversation, in which the agent of the joint committee was informed that a certain participating country was cooperating and "cracking down on transit trade." Such a statement, if accepted and incorporated in a report, since it was pleasant news, would necessarily have led to erroneous conclusions, because the agent had just been in that country and had been informed by our representatives on the spot that the country in question had no intention of cooperating with the United States in the control of its transit trade. Consequently, the question was asked as to what happened when that country "cracked down" and the answer was that the officers of the country watched the transit trade and told our representatives what was going through. The information was not true; but even if true, such activity could hardly be described as "cracking down."

In another participating country our representative received a cable instructing him to immediately contact the officials of this country to obtain their agreement to conform their operations to the British list, the cable stating that other countries had done so and that the country in question could be accused of dragging its feet if it delayed. Our representative immediately contacted the officials of the country in question and was informed by them that his information was incorrect, and that no country except the United Kingdom itself had agreed to the British list. This misinformation unnecessarily embarrassed our representative, who should have been told the exact facts, which were that negotiations were still pending with the other countries named in the cable.

The situation in the Bizone was particularly bad. The matter of control over exports, imports, and transit trade was divided into such small pieces and so scattered about among various divisions, branches, and agencies, both German and American, that people at the operating level did not know what others were doing nor did superiors know what subordinates were doing and they had even less idea of what other divisions and branches were doing in connection with the same matter. It was assumed by practically everybody that the situation was well under control but always because of the activity of someone else upon whom reliance was placed to safeguard our interests. Invariably, however, upon investigation it developed that the someone else did not have his routine set up to do, and actually was not doing, whatever it was that he was assumed to be doing.

No one in the export control branch of JEIA knew how many export documents were issued to German exporters or what happened to them after the exporter took them away, but it was assumed that all transactions received a post audit. The head of this branch also assumed that ECA and JEIA cooperated on all exports.

When those officials of JEIA were taken through their procedures, step by step, it developed that controls over exports to participating countries (subject to transshipment) were operated entirely by German authorities and neither ECA nor JEIA ever received any information on this part of the export business. Transshipments will be discussed under the heading Transit trade.

With respect to exports direct to iron-curtain countries, the German exporter filed with JEIA three copies of his application, which became a certificate of approval when signed by JEIA.[4] The certificate could be on a form printed commercially or could be typewritten by the exporter. Both types were inspected and each had blank lines on them which could be filled in with other items by the exporter after JEIA had signed them and handed all copies back to the exporter.

The signed certificates of approval were then taken by the exporter to any one of 300 German banks which had authority to issue the ECD (export-control document). The bank kept one copy of the certificate of approval and handed the others back to the exporter, together with four copies of the ECD. The bank kept the fifth copy of the ECD in its files and sent the sixth to the JEIA field office in the territory in which the exporter was located. The bank could issue several separate ECD's, each covering an item on the certificate of approval, but no one checked the bank to see that a clerk had not issued several ECD's for each item. This would be most important if the exporter had added some I–A items to the certificate subsequent to receiving it back after approval by JEIA.

In any event, the four copies of the ECD accompanied the goods to the border, where they were checked by the German customs officials who, in the opinion of the American officer in charge of the Army detachment which works with them, were cooperative and were doing a good job. German customs picked up three of the four ECD's, retained one for its own files, sent one to the Bizone German statistical office and the third to the JEIA statistical office, which, however, did not check it, being interested only in the compiling of statistics of trade—that is, value and broad type of commodity, date, and country of destination. Thus, no used copy of the ECD was ever returned to an office which had a copy of the document as originally issued and there was literally no copy existent of the certificate of approval which could be accepted as being untampered with and in its original state when signed by JEIA and before it was delivered to the exporter.

This tremendous mass of paper work had produced no control which could not be easily evaded, and that without the slightest danger of later discovery.

Inasmuch as the Bizone is a producer of many articles of strategic importance, it seems clear that, unless the situation which has existed there is remedied, the whole plan of preventing the shipment of such articles behind the iron curtain may collapse, because participating nations cannot be expected to refuse to issue export licenses if the articles can be easily obtained in the Bizone.

It may be here stated that the Bizone compared most unfavorably to Austria, where the cordial relations existing between ECA and the military resulted in what appeared to be the most cooperative and efficient operation seen in any of the countries visited.[5]

Transit trade

The free ports of Europe have back of them traditions which are several centuries old and no country wishes to impose new restrictions upon them, particularly when the only probable result would be to drive the transit trade to the ports of some other country. Effective direct control in this field clearly depends upon the unanimous action of many countries and hope of that had better be abandoned, at least for the immediate future.

The change from a seller's to a buyer's market will undoubtedly accentuate the importance of this phase of world trade. As business falls off and the pressure to make sales to keep factories going becomes greater, and as export controls on direct shipments get tighter, it may be expected that individual manufacturers in various countries, including our own, will look around for legal loopholes which will permit the sale and shipment of prohibited articles. The transit trade extends an open invitation, offering, as it does, the defense that the exporter did not know the ultimate destination.

Under the present procedure, which varies little from country to country, a merchant in any participating country can order merchandise shipped to him from, say, the United States, and upon arrival at the port of his country have it unloaded in the free port area, where it is placed under guard by the customs officials, but only for the purpose of preventing entry into the country without payment of customs dues. No import license is required for entry into the free port. The merchant may then order the merchandise sent to a customer behind the iron curtain (or to any other place, for that matter) and no export license is required, because it is considered that the merchandise had never entered into the economy of the country in question.

Although the situation differs slightly in the various participating countries, it may be said that generally a license for the export of an article of strategic importance will issue almost automatically if the destination stated in the application be another participating country. Strangely enough, the most difficult participating country to deal with in this field has been the Bizone. While admitting in correspondence with our representatives in other parts of Europe that it was "unquestionably true" that there have been bad leaks of strategic articles from the Bizone, the authorities there have adamantly refused to have anything to do with screening exports to participating countries. In fact, the agent of the joint committee was informed by the economic adviser to the military governor that it would take an order from Washington to change the then-existing procedure of having export licenses to participating countries handled exclusively by German authorities.

The principal difficulty in controlling transit trade is that practically all countries, including our own, attempt to shift onto someone else the responsibility of dealing with it.

The theory in operation at present is that the burden should be placed upon the country of destination to prevent transshipment. This ignores the fact that neither an import nor subsequent export license is required unless the article is to be brought into the economy of the purchaser's country, and such is not the case with transshipments. The remedy for this situation is to impose export controls upon shipments to all countries of articles of strategic importance, and to require the exporter to name his customer and to present the customer's import license with the application for export.[6] The exporting country should then be required to check the proposed end use in the importing country, which can be done through its representatives in that country. The proposed method sounds very complicated and hard to work but, in reality, there is nothing difficult about it, given the required personnel. That part of the suggestion pertaining to the issuance of the import license before the customer can make his purchase is now in operation in one country and the end use investigation by our representatives in the importing country upon cabled request from the exporting country is now in operation in a few other countries. Putting the two together should be no great task, particularly if, with the elimination of secrecy, the telephone can be used and messages back and forth need not go through two code rooms.

Extent of list of restricted articles

Although it is recommended that direction over the complete export control operation should be centered in one place instead of scattered throughout several departments and agencies and although secrecy should be entirely eliminated and an agreement reached by all countries on what items are to be controlled, this does not mean that some inflexible paper system must be created, pursuant to which all countries, acting in concert, must do the same thing at the same time and in the same way. The countries differ in size, location, extent of indigenous production, historical attachment to neutrality, reliance upon transit trade, and dependence upon ECA aid. Export control can be imposed in some countries administratively and in others through operation of law, openly published, as in the United Kingdom. Whatever the system, however, there must be a frank exchange of information to allay suspicions of cheating, which the investigation disclosed were prevalent.

The extent of the list of restricted articles seems to be the core of the problem. In between the extremes, found in all countries, of the trade-conscious official who wishes to ship practically everything and the security-conscious official who wishes to ship practically nothing, other officials have operated, attempting to safeguard security without killing all trade. Proceeding independently, each country for itself, it could not be expected that results produced would be uniform.

So, up to the present, natural evolution has brought about—

(a) The United States I–A list, which several countries follow;

(b) The British list, which several other countries follow; and

[4] In the event that the export of an article also required the approval of the German Economic Administration, because of the effect of the export upon German economy, 4 copies were executed.

[5] The controller of the ECA mission had been excluded from this field, but, as already noted, the change in system should have remedied this situation by now.

[6] In the case of the United States, the possibility of transshipments from Western Hemisphere countries should not be overlooked. Participating nations can do nothing about this situation.

(c) Separate lists in a few countries which, however, refuse to disclose, or even discuss, the contents.

Cutting across (a) and (b) are suggested additional articles controlled in some countries which are not on our list—and these countries cannot understand why not.

The problem of those participating nations, with a strong tradition of neutrality, which still cling to the hope of an indefinite continuation of that status, presents additional difficulties. Nothing said herein is intended to imply that our representatives have not done all they could under the circumstances and no suggestions for further activity are made. We must, it seems, wait for the realization to come that if existing antagonisms between the western Asiatic civilization and our own come to a head, no country will be an oasis.

It is the general feeling of our representatives abroad, in which the agent of the joint committee joins, that the shorter the list the more efficient will be the operation. Consideration should be given to a short list of really strategic articles, without which war cannot be waged, as an alternative to a long list. It may also be said that the shorter the list, the fewer disputes there will be and the less chance there will be of a purchaser being able to obtain in one country an article which another country will not export. As the situation exists today, with the British having one list and the United States another, and some participating countries inclining to one list and some to the other, a fertile field exists for suspicions and doubts, and a country following our list is bound to lose trade to a country following the shorter British list. That has actually happened and we have not been entirely blameless ourselves in authorizing the export of certain articles after another country has refused.

Although agreement upon the articles to be included in a list appears to be mainly a technical question which the military men in the various countries should settle in short order if left to themselves, difficulties of description should not be overlooked, because the definitions used should be (1) precise enough to stand up in court if it be necessary to prosecute a violator of control regulations, (2) not so broad as to include articles the export of which it is not intended to prohibit, and (3) simple enough for customs officials to understand and apply.

PART II. END-USE CHECKING

This section of the report deals with checking by ECA of the arrival, distribution, and use of ECA-financed articles, such as wheat, cotton, tractors, copper, etc. The fact that the article may also be of strategic importance causes no change in procedure, as the object of the investigation by ECA is to see that goods paid for actually arrive and are distributed to the purchaser who is supposed to receive them.

Up to the middle of June 1949 such checking had been inconsequential in extent although such end-use checks as had been made were thorough and informative. This failure in performance is not attributable to incompetent personnel, but rather to other reasons explained below.

Lack of personnel

As of June 1, 1949, the controller's office in Europe consisted of 45 Americans, 19 American secretaries, and 43 aliens, spread over 13 countries and the office of the special representative. The limit of one man's ability in end-use checking is two or three jobs a week. The aliens, of course, are not available for use in checking when security problems are involved, and the 45 Americans naturally are not all available for end-use checking. A rough estimate of the end-use checks possible with the personnel then available is about 50 a week in all of the countries put together. This, obviously, could no more than scratch the surface, even though the checks which have been made are good.

As the Administrator states in his letter to the chairman of the joint committee,[7] "ECA has been cognizant of the fact that more manpower is necessary," and its budget for the current fiscal year contemplates an expansion in the controller's staff in Europe.

The joint committee brought this matter to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, and the following language is found in its report (S. Rept. 812, pp. 6–7):

"The committee allowed the full request of $16,500,000 for administrative expenses, and took special cognizance of the increase requested for the controller's offices abroad. It is felt that these offices are a most sensitive and vital aspect of the proper administration of the Economic Cooperative Administration and the committee expects the offices of the controller to be implemented as indicated in the budget justification. For fiscal 1950 the budget proposal indicates additions of 47 American personnel to these offices. It is the view of the committee that such increase is entirely justified and should be accomplished as expeditiously as feasible."

The increase in personnel will undoubtedly result in more extensive checking, but the fact must be frankly faced that the controllers abroad will not be able to do more than to keep an eye on the reporting systems installed and operated by the participating countries themselves and to spot-check on various specific shipments. Anything more than that would require a tremendous staff which would undoubtedly cost more than the additional work produced would be worth.

To supplement the controller's staff, ECA has engaged, in some countries, the services of Société Generale de Surveillance S. A. a Swiss firm of good reputation, to check all arrivals of ECA-financed goods and to spot-check end use in 10 to 25 percent of the cases. The fees and expenses of this firm are paid in counterpart funds and not out of ECA's dollar appropriation.

Business secrets

The disinclination of foreign businessmen to permit ECA controllers to make inspections of records and factories required by a proper end-use check, particularly of raw materials, varies in the different participating countries from practically none at all to considerable. In fact, in one country an officer of the local American chamber of commerce undertook to prepare a brochure containing the names of American companies represented by local firms, the objective being to let prospective customers know where they could place orders, but over 70 percent of the local firms refused to furnish the information, stating that the names of the American companies represented by them were confidential information which could not be disclosed. This undoubtedly sets a new record for business secrets, but it also illustrates the difficulties, as an extreme case to be sure, which face controllers who must produce results without at the same time creating antagonisms.

It does not seem that this situation can be treated en masse, by a rule or regulation, but rather that an educational campaign is required, in cooperation with the participating countries.

Cooperation by OEEC

Subsection (b) of section 115 of Public Law 472 (80th Cong.) requires that the participating countries make efficient and practical use of their own resources and of commodities, facilities, and service furnished through ECA. The several countries have so agreed in the bilateral agreements which each has separately entered into with the United States.[8]

Switzerland.

Subsection (d) of the same section provides:

"The Administrator shall encourage the joint organization of the participating countries referred to in subsection (b) of this section to insure that each participating country makes efficient use of the resources of such country, including any commodities, facilities, or service furnished under this title, by observing and reviewing such use through an effective follow-up system approved by the joint organization."

In July 1948 the controller for the Office of Special Representative met with representatives of OEEC to discuss the matter, but it developed that OEEC had no plans or secretariat to explore the problem. Consequently, the ECA country missions proceeded, more or less independently of each other, to develop whatever procedures were possible to comply with the statute.

In January 1949 the deputy United States Special Representative again called the matter to the attention of OEEC, and in February the controller forwarded to OEEC a memorandum which set forth in considerable detail the system of reporting and checking which ECA considered necessary. An ad hoc working party was then set up by OEEC to make a study and report; and in due course the matter was acted upon by the Council at its meeting on June 27, 1949, as follows:

"The Council, considering article 12 (b) of the convention for European Economic Cooperation of April 16, 1948; considering the decision of the Council of February 16, 1948, on methods of observation and review; and considering the report of the ad hoc working party on systems of observation and review of April 29, 1949, decides—

"1. That to insure the efficient use both of external aid and of indigenous resources, the members shall, on request of the ECA mission in their respective countries and taking into account the provisions of paragraph 2 below—

"(a) furnish to the mission full information in regard to the methods of control of imports and their distribution and use and the control of exports;

"(b) afford to the mission facilities for observation, review, and testing of the effectiveness of such controls;

"(c) furnish to the mission at regular intervals full reports covering all ECA-financed commodities (whether procured on a loan or grant basis) which would identify the commodities by procurement authorization number and establish the fact of their arrival within the country. Where practicable, the reports should identify the first consignee and afford some indication of the time of shipment and reasonable information as to the dates of arrival and the first movement from port of the commodities;

"(d) furnish to the mission special reports of the distribution and use of particular ECA-financed commodities or items to the point of their receipt by the final consignee;

"(e) use their best endeavors to facilitate access by the mission to documents, both of a public and private trade character, which would confirm the facts of arrival and movement of ECA-financed commodities or items;

"(f) afford at convenient times and in reasonable extent, so far as compatible with the laws of the particular participating country, the privilege of personal inspection by representatives of the mission to investigate port controls, witness the arrival and discharge of cargoes, follow the movement of commodities, interview appropriate persons, and take photographs in relation to ECA aid. By negotiation between the mission and the government of the participating country,

[7] See appendix to this report.

[8] There is no bilateral agreement with these privileges may include the use of professional assistance employed by the ECA mission;

"(g) in the case of alleged improper use of ECA aid, afford special assistance to the mission in making investigations and in securing authoritative documents or reports to develop the truth or falsity of the allegation.

"2. The actual extent, form, and manner of the information and facilities to be afforded by a participating country to the ECA mission shall be the subject of negotiation between the government of the participating country and the mission, taking into account the general obligations set out in paragraph 1 above.

"3. Should serious difficulties arise in the case of any member country, or serious problems be presented of an international character, which would require in the opinion of a participating country or of the Office of the Special Representative in Europe the benefit of the counsel and assistance of the organization for the purpose of their solution, a request that a meeting of expert representatives of the countries and of representatives of OSR should be convened, should be addressed to the secretary general, with suggestions as to its terms of reference, for consideration by the executive committee. These experts could make proposals thereon to the Council if necessary.

"4. The present decision shall not apply to members which notify the secretary general that their relations in this respect with the Economic Cooperation Administration are governed by arrangements specially designed to cover their particular position with the effect of dispensing them from the application of the present decision."

Although the time lag was considerable, the importance of this, for the future, lies in the acceptance of the principle that ECA should receive full information on controls and should be permitted to test their effectiveness. This decision of OEEC may be taken as concrete evidence that ECA has made considerable progress in overcoming the usual objections, presented by a minority of the countries, that such investigations constituted an invasion of private papers, interfered with trade, infringed sovereignty, etc. The controller of ECA in Washington states definitely that, since the decision, ECA's difficulties in exercising its privileges of access and inspection have decreased measurably in all of the participating countries except, of course, in Switzerland which receives no ECA-financed goods and where there is no end-use checking by ECA.

PART III. CONCLUSION

It is impossible to even hazard a guess on the extent of trade in 1–A articles, although an official of ECA stated that, in his opinion, up to May 1, 1949, there were less than 100 cases of the export of such items in all of the participating countries put together.

Things cannot have been that good, however, because—

(1) In one country 26 separate 1–A items were exported in the 4 months beginning December 1948 under existing trade treaties with iron-curtain countries;

(2) In another country our representative estimated that such trade in 1947 amounted to $1,500,000, and the 1948 trade probably was at least as great;

(3) In the Bizone it was estimated that $200,000,000 in goods had been smuggled out in 1948, and the Bizone produces many 1–A articles; [9]

(4) No information exists as to the amount of 1–A articles which have moved through the transit trade; and

(5) Information about the exports of a number of the countries is sketchy in the extreme.

[9] Rept. No. 2 of the Military Governors of United States and United Kingdom, December 1948, p. 11.

With the increase in European production generally, and the change from a seller's to a buyer's market, both here and abroad, control of the trade in articles of strategic importance must receive more and better attention.

Mr. Hoffman states in his letter that "the export-compliance function of the United States Government is normally carried on by the Department of Commerce, which now has only two or three traveling agents abroad. Unless the Department of Commerce is given a larger appropriation for compliance activities, it will be difficult to increase the effectiveness of United States control in matters of transshipment." [10]

A study of the entire field should have led to exactly the opposite conclusion. The foreign operation of the Department of Commerce has been so small that it cannot have been effective except on a spot-check basis, and that to a very moderate extent.

The Department of Commerce has the control organization in the United States, and ECA has its controller's staff and East-West Trade Division abroad. Rather than duplicate organizations, each should call upon the other for assistance in the field in which such other has an operating organization.

It is self-evident that ECA cannot function alone in the field which has been under consideration. It requires, deserves, and should have the fullest cooperation from the Departments of State, National Defense, and Commerce.

All four agencies could very well use an improved system of interdepartmental communication so that decisions can be arrived at promptly and our representatives abroad relieved of the necessity of waiting weeks and sometimes months for the answer to important questions. The elimination of all secrecy will aid materially in this.

Negotiations with the participating nations should be concluded, and questions about the list of prohibited exports and about methods to control the transit trade should be disposed of as speedily as possible.

The situation in Germany should have special attention so that other participating nations may no longer use it as an excuse for not doing better themselves.

Time may well be of the essence in all of these matters.

APPENDIX

Hon. PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARRAN: We wish to thank you for transmitting the reports of Mr. Robert N. Golding in connection with East-West trade matters. His reports have been useful to our people in Washington. His report on the situation in Germany is one of the most complete we have received.

We agree with the majority of the conclusions reached as a result of Mr. Golding's study. In connection with Mr. Golding's criticism of the degree of secrecy relating to east-west trade export controls, some action has already been taken. The so-called I–A and I–B lists have been down-graded to a confidential classification and the Department of Commerce is presently contemplating publishing the lists, embodying them in a large list of all of the items controlled by the United States.

On the question of the length of the I–A embargo list, Mr. Golding has recommended that a shorter list of the most strategic items would be more feasible and more realistic. From the outset ECA has held this position. Other agencies have advocated more extensive lists. The present lists represent a compromise on this point. ECA has in preparation a further analysis of the problem, based on experience to date, which will be presented shortly for interagency consideration.

Mr. Golding has reported that the present staff of the controller's office in Europe is so small that it cannot "do more than scratch the surface" of the necessary end-use check. ECA has been cognizant of the fact that more manpower is necessary for this purpose. In the budget estimate for administration presented to the Congress early this year, ECA's plans for expansion of the controller's staff in Europe were set forth. Within the limits of its administrative appropriation, ECA will extend the extent of end-use checking carried on by the controller's office. However, as Mr. Golding points out, the export-compliance function of the United States Government is normally carried on by the Department of Commerce, which now has only two or three traveling agents abroad. Unless the Department of Commerce is given a larger appropriation for compliance activities, it will be difficult to increase the effectiveness of United States control in matters of transshipment.

Mr. Golding has mentioned certain problems relating to cooperation between the controller's office and the east-west trade offices of ECA in Europe. This matter has been thoroughly reviewed and the east-west trade offices and the controller's offices in each of the country missions are working closely on all questions of east-west trade control.

We appreciate having the benefit of these reports and shall keep you and your committee informed of any further developments in east-west trade which you may desire.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL G. HOFFMAN,
Administrator.

PROPOSALS FOR COMMITTEES OR COMMISSIONS OF PRIVATE CITIZENS TO PERFORM CERTAIN GOVERNMENTAL FUNCTIONS

Mr. TAFT obtained the floor.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. For what purpose does the Senator request that I yield?

Mr. MALONE. In order that I may make, for the RECORD, a statement which will take about 5 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Ohio may yield for that purpose.

Mr. TAFT. Very well; I yield.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, many suggestions have recently been made for improving the procedure designed to protect the security of this country, through the appointment of unofficial civilian committees to take the responsibility for the problems which embarrass the administration.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Nevada flatly rejects all proposals for committees or commissions of private citizens to take over governmental functions. A suggestion has been made for the appointment of leading non-office-holding citizens to form a commission on national security, which the President himself has denounced as a super-government. A more recent suggestion has been made—and this one emanates from administration circles—for the appointment of additional private citizens as a superloyalty board to examine charges that Red sympathizers and poor security risks are in Government posts.

The President already has one so-called Loyalty Review Board, composed of his own unconfirmed appointees. Although generally speaking it has functioned only as a whitewash board, it could serve a useful purpose if the President so desired.

Who are these superhuman beings qualified to be above the officials elected by the people, above duly authorized government?

If they have superqualifications, why are not they elected by the people as their representatives or appointed by the President for his Cabinet? It has been suggested that the leading citizens appointed to these committees would be above the Constitution and its processes, and would somehow be above all others appointed by the President. This Senator has always believed that the President should appoint the best men in the country for his Cabinet, to run the executive branch of the Government. Are the men now being suggested for the supergovernment posts better men than those now in the President's Cabinet? If so, the President should fire his present Cabinet members and should appoint these men.

Mr. President, the Congress has been a check on the Executive. Its Members are versed in phases in Government questions. If the Congress, elected to represent the people, is not able to determine the questions, who is? Is there any reason why outsiders should come in and try to do our job for us?

I have noted that the persons favoring the establishment of nonpartisan commissions or committees of private citizens to take over processes of government fall, curiously enough, into one of three classifications: (a) Persons who lean toward socialistic aims; (b) persons overly concerned with the present uneasy position of Red sympathizers, who seem to object to the exposé of traitors in the administration; and (c) persons in the administration who want to perpetuate any and all so-called bipartisan moves, so that the administration may share with the Republicans all blame for its failures.

As for a new loyalty review committee, as suggested by administration circles, is there any reason to believe its members would function any better than the members of the present Loyalty Review Board? What is needed is a Loyalty Review Board set up as an independent establishment, with its members appointed by the President and investigated and passed upon by the Senate, as provided in my resolution, Senate Resolution 230, submitted by me on February 17, 1950, and now buried in a Democrat-controlled committee. Such a Board would be accountable to both the President and the Congress, as it should be.

EXTENSION OF RENT CONTROL

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a moment, while I ask that the House amendment to the bill (S. 3181) to extend for 1 year the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, be laid before the Senate?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Ohio may yield for the purpose indicated.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 3181, to extend rent control.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3181) to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes, which was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That this act may be cited as the "Housing and Rent Act of 1950."

SEC. 2. Section 4 (e) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out "June 30, 1950" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

SEC. 3. Section 204 (a) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out "June 30, 1950" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

SEC. 4. Section 204 (f) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(f) (1) The provisions of this title, except section 204 (a), shall cease to be in effect at the close of January 31, 1951, except that they shall cease to be in effect at the close of June 30, 1951—

"(A) in any incorporated city, town, or village which, at a time when maximum rents under this title are in effect therein, and prior to January 31, 1951, declares (by resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose, or by popular referendum, in accordance with local law) that a shortage of rental housing accommodations exists which requires the continuance of rent control in such city, town, or village; and

"(B) in any unincorporated locality in a defense-rental area in which one or more incorporated cities, towns, or villages constituting the major portion of the defense-rental area have made the declaration specified in subparagraph (A) at a time when maximum rents under this title were in effect in such unincorporated locality.

"(2) Any incorporated city, town, or village which makes the declaration specified in paragraph (1) (A) of this subsection shall notify the Housing Expediter in writing of such action promptly after it has been taken.

"(3) Notwithstanding any provision of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the provisions of this title shall cease to be in effect upon the date of a proclamation by the President or upon the date specified in a concurrent resolution by the two Houses of the Congress, declaring that the further continuance of the authority granted by this title is not necessary because of the existence of an emergency, whichever date is the earlier.

"(4) Notwithstanding any provision of paragraph (1) or (3) of this subsection, the provisions of this title and regulations, orders, and requirements thereunder shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper suit or action with respect to any right or liability incurred prior to the termination date specified in such paragraph."

SEC. 5. Section 204 (j) (3) of the Housing and Rent Act of 1947 as amended is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(3) The Housing Expediter shall terminate the provisions of this title in any incorporated city, town, village, or in the unincorporated area of any county upon receipt of a resolution of its governing body adopted for that purpose in accordance with applicable local law and based upon a finding by such governing body reached as the result of a public hearing held after 10 days' notice, that there no longer exists such a shortage in rental housing accommodations as to require rent control in such city, town, village, or unincorporated area in such county: Provided, That where the major portion of a defense-rental area has been decontrolled pursuant to this paragraph (3), the Housing Expediter shall decontrol any unincorporated locality in the remainder of such area."

SEC. 6. Nothing in this act or in the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, shall be construed to require any person to offer any housing accommodations for rent.

SEC. 7. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act, and the applicability of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 8. This act shall become effective on the first day of the first calendar month following the month in which it is enacted.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that conferees be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as a substitute, and on behalf of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], I move that the Senate amend the amendment of the House by striking out "7 months" and inserting in lieu thereof "6 months". I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has the floor, and he cannot be taken from the floor by the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. Is the motion in order?

Mr. WHERRY. No; not unless the Senator from Ohio yields for that purpose.

Mr. TAFT. I mean, is it in order, anyway?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not unless the Senator yields, and the Chair is not sure, even when he has yielded, that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska would be in order.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not intend to yield for the purpose of a quorum call, or for the purpose of a general debate on the subject of rent control, to which it would undoubtedly lead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I offer amendments to the pending bill (H. R. 6000) on behalf of myself, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL], the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The amendments provide for coverage on a mandatory basis of the employees of transit systems operated by municipalities or other political subdivisions of States. I should like to have the amendments printed and lie on the table.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator be willing to add my name as a cosponsor of the amendments? I had intended to offer an amendment of the same sort myself.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be very glad to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois offer the amendments as the pending question, or to be printed and lie on the table? There is no pending amendment, other than the committee amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well; I offer the amendments as the pending question, and I add as a cosponsor of the amendments the name of the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

The amendments submitted by Mr. LUCAS (for himself and and other Senators) are as follows:

On page 246, beginning with line 13, strike out all down to and including line 24 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) (A) Service performed in the employ of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing which is wholly owned by one or more States or political subdivisions (other than service included under an agreement under sec. 218 and other than service performed in the employ of a State, political subdivision, or instrumentality in connection with the operation of any public-transportation system the whole or any part of which was acquired after 1936).

"(B) Service performed in the employ of any instrumentality of one or more States or political subdivisions to the extent that the instrumentality is, with respect to such service, immune under the Constitution of the United States from the tax imposed by section 1410 of the Internal Revenue Code (other than service included under an agreement under sec. 218)."

On page 328, beginning with line 8, strike out all down to and including line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) (A) Service performed in the employ of a State, or any political subdivision thereof, or any instrumentality of any one or more of the foregoing which is wholly owned by one or more State or political subdivisions (other than service performed in the employ of a State, political subdivision of any public-transportation system the whole or any part of which was acquired after 1936).

"(B) Service performed in the employ of any instrumentality of one or more States or political subdivisions to the extent that the instrumentality is, with respect to such service, immune under the Constitution of the United States from the tax imposed by section 1410."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in connection with the amendments, I ask unanimous consent that a short statement of explanation be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRANSIT EMPLOYEES AMENDMENT TO H. R. 6000

This amendment provides for coverage on a mandatory basis for the employees of transit systems operated by municipalities or other political subdivisions of States. This result is obtained by amending the section defining "employment" so that service for publicly operated transportation systems is included within the types of employment covered by the old-age and survivors insurance program. Employees of all transportation systems taken over by municipalities or political subdivisions of States after 1936 would be brought under the social-security system by this amendment.

The comparable provision included in the House bill would have covered only the employees who worked for the transit company at the time it was taken over by the municipality. Representatives of the Amalgamated Association of Street, Electric Railway and Motor Coach Employees of America testified against this provision. The amendment proposed here would meet with their approval.

In the Senate Finance Committee the sections providing for special treatment for this group of employees were dropped. Under the committee bill they will be covered only if they qualify under the section pertaining to public employees generally. This means they can obtain social-security coverage only if they do not have a retirement plan and if the State legislature enters into a compact with the Federal Security Administrator providing for the coverage of the transit employees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois for himself and other Senators.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I also offer an amendment to the bill, on behalf of myself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. The amendment would amend the Social Security Act by adding a new title providing for the payment of insurance benefits by the Federal Government under certain circumstances. The amendment is entirely different from the present provisions of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment just offered on behalf of myself and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], which provides for the establishment of a fund to be used for grants to State unemployment compensation systems which are being depleted, I ask unanimous consent that a short statement of explanation of the amendment may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRANTS TO STATE UNEMPLOYMENT FUNDS

Section 404 of H. R. 6000 was inserted by the Senate Finance Committee. It provides for the reestablishment of a loan fund for State unemployment compensation systems which are being depleted.

This amendment would delete that section and provide instead for grants to State systems which are being depleted. In order to implement this provision for grants, the funds collected by the Federal unemployment tax would be earmarked so that a Federal fund would be accumulated for this purpose.

Title 12 was originally enacted in 1944 and is the loan provision extended by section 404 of the committee bill. This amendment provides a new title 12.

A State would be entitled to a reinsurance grant for any calendar quarter commencing after October 1, 1950, if that State's unemployment fund is less than the amount of the compensation paid by the State during the preceding 6 months. In order to qualify for such a grant after December 31, 1952, a State whose unemployment fund is being depleted must have had a minimum payroll tax of 1.2 percent.

Under this amendment the size of the grant will be equal to three-fourths of the excess of the compensation payable during the quarter over 2 percent of the taxable payroll, except that after June 30, 1953, increases in the compensation within the year preceding the application for a grant shall be disregarded.

The last paragraph of the amendment earmarks for the Federal unemployment account the funds collected under the Unemployment Tax Act which are not used for the payment of administrative expenses.

The other sections of the amendment provide for the administration of the grant program by the Secretary of Labor.

ARGUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT

Although the loan fund now contained in title 12 of the Social Security Act has been in existence since 1944, it has not been used. This, of course, can be explained by the fact that most State unemployment compensation systems were not depleted during those years of high employment. However, as unemployment in local areas does increase, it becomes more and more obvious that the provision for loans is completely inadequate.

In at least 28 States there would be serious constitutional questions with respect to the State borrowing money in this way. This in itself is a major argument against reliance on such a loan provision.

The unemployment compensation program is financed by a payroll tax. As employment decreases, the total revenue from this tax is greatly reduced. At the same time, increasing unemployment brings an increased drain upon the unemployment compensation fund of the State. The loan provision would require the State to go further into debt under these circumstances. The loan would have to be repaid, but the State has no foreseeable means of repaying it. The States in which the unemployment funds are being depleted will have ever-increasing financial difficulties under this loan provision.

A provision for grants to the unemployment-compensation funds which are being depleted because of high unemployment in particular States will more adequately meet the needs of these States. It seems proper to use the funds collected from a payroll tax designed to provide unemployment compensation for this purpose. In the past these funds have gone into general revenue. At the present time, up to 90 percent of the Federal unemployment tax may be paid to approved State unemployment-compensation funds. The other 10 percent of the Federal tax is collected by the Federal Government. Administrative expenses have been met from these collections, but the excess has gone into general revenue. If these amounts were transferred to a Federal unemployment account over a period of years, a fund would be built up which could be used to aid State funds which are being depleted.

The amendment does not change the present arrangement of State administration of these funds. The amendment provides for certain conditions which must be met by any State before a grant will be available. If that State's unemployment fund is being depleted, the State must provide a payroll tax of at least 1.2 percent before any grant will be available.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I also offer and send to the desk an amendment on behalf of myself and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. The amendment provides for assistance payments to the caretakers of dependent children. The amendment is in line with what the House of Representatives agreed to, but what the Senate Finance Committee saw fit to eliminate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in connection with this amendment offered on behalf of the Senator from Pensylvania [Mr. MYERS] and myself, I ask unanimous consent that a short explanation of that amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS TO THE CARETAKER OF DEPENDENT CHILDREN

H. R. 6000, as passed by the House, provided for Federal sharing in aid furnished to meet the needs of the relative with whom a dependent child receiving aid is living, to the same extent as it shares in the cost of aid furnished dependent children. The maximum individual payment to be counted for this purpose would be the same as for the first dependent child.

The Senate Finance Committee omitted this provision from the bill it reported. This amendment would insert into the bill the provisions as passed by the House of Representatives.

ANALYSIS OF AMENDMENT

The desired result is obtained by amending the following sections of the committee bill:

Section 321

The changes on page 378 of the bill are necessary to prevent a recipient of old-age assistance from also receiving a benefit payment as a caretaker of a dependent child.

Section 322

This section in the bill amends section 403 (a) of the Social Security Act by increasing the maximum amount for the first child from $27 to $30 and the amount for the other children from $18 to $20. In order to provide for payments to the caretaker it is necessary to restate this entire section, including the formula for Federal matching of funds. (Three-fourths of the first $12 and one-half of the excess up to the individual maximums of $30 for the first child and the caretaker and $20 for each additional dependent child.) This means that up to $18 of Federal funds will be available for each caretaker.

This provision would take effect October 1, 1950.

Section 323

This section is amended (p. 379, line 10) so that the definition of aid to dependent children will include payments to the relative with whom a dependent child is living. The relatives already specified by existing law are father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, brother, sister, stepfather, stepmother, stepbrother, stepsister, uncle, or aunt.

Section 341

This section is amended (p. 381, line 14) so that persons receiving aid as the caretaker of dependent children shall not also be entitled to assistance under the aid-to-the-blind program.

ARGUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT

The program in the past has provided aid to the dependent children, but has made no provision for the parent or relative with whom the children are staying. This does not seem proper or sensible. If the problem of providing in some way for dependent children is to be met at all through the combined efforts of State and Federal financing, it would seem only sensible to make that aid available in such a way that the parent or relative may properly care for the child.

The existing law is completely inadequate in recognizing the fact that dependent children qualify as such only if one or both of the parents are away from the home and they meet a needs test. The program should be administered in such a way that the home that is available may be kept intact. This necessitates some provision for the parent or relative with whom the children are staying.

The American Legion has actively sponsored this amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the pending bill attempts to improve the system of old-age and survivors insurance, which has been in effect for a period of 14 years. That system has been frequently criticized. I remember the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] made a speech which lasted throughout an entire day, pointing out the inequalities and unsoundness of this system. Certainly it is long overdue for improvement. The general purposes of the present bill have now been endorsed by both political parties for a period of probably as much as 8 years. I know they were endorsed in the Republican platform of 1944. In the Republican platform of 1948 we favored "extension of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program and an increase of the benefits to a more realistic level." In the statement of Republican principles and objectives adopted by the Republican Members of the House and Senate about the 1st of February of this year, as I recall, and also by the Republican National Committee, we undertook this obligation:

The obligation of government to those in need has long been recognized. Recognizing the inequities and injustices of the present program of social security, we urge (a) the extension of the coverage of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program, reduction of eligibility requirements, and increase of benefits to a more generous level, with due regard to the tax burden on those who labor; (b) a thoroughgoing study of a program of more nearly universal coverage, including the principle of pay-as-you-go.

The pending bill does exactly what was at that time proposed. It extends the coverage of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program by including, as I remember the number, including 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 people under 65 years of age who are not now included, and it reduces the eligibility requirements by giving what is called the "new start," so that anyone who starts now to pay will, after about a year and a half, I believe, or after six quarters of covered employment, come under the benefits of the system. It increases the benefits to a more generous level, by increasing them approximately by 85 or 90 percent.

I think it should be made perfectly clear what the bill does not do. The present old-age and survivors insurance program provides benefits for about 2,000,000 people over 65 years of age, so far as the payment of benefits at the present time is concerned, although of course many millions more look forward to benefits under it. Those 2,000,000 people are today receiving a wholly inadequate pension, one which is worth about half what it was when the system was inaugurated in 1936.

There are 11,500,000 people over 65 years of age, and the present system does not cover more than 2,000,000. It therefore does not meet the general demand for old-age pension for the people who are over 65 years of age today.

Outside the 2,000,000 receiving benefits under this system, I think about 2,800,000 are getting old-age assistance on a needs basis, through a combination of State and Federal payments, which costs the Federal Government today approximately $900,000,000.

The pending bill increases the coverage of old-age insurance. I do not think I shall want to discuss the details. There are many detailed questions as to who should be covered and who should not be. In general, the committee tried to cover everyone they thought could be covered on a compulsory basis, where it was practicable, and where there was not a substantial objection on the part of those who are not now covered.

The benefits, as I say, are increased by from 85 percent to 90 percent, both the benefits of those who have already retired, and, of course, the benefits of those who may be retired in the future; and I point out also that the eligibility requirements are reduced.

In addition to the general question of the old-age and survivors insurance, the bill also tries to improve the public assistance programs by which the Federal Government shares on a needs basis with the States in paying old-age assistance aid to the blind and aid to dependend children. The House bill actually increased the Federal share of those payments to an extent which would have cost the Federal Treasury about $235,000,000 a year in addition to what we now pay. The Senate committee felt, I think very strongly, that there was no particular reason at this time for increasing the Federal proportion, because the Federal Government has a deficit of $6,000,000,000 a year, while the States are reasonably well off. So there was no reason why the Federal share of these other payments should be increased, and no reason why the total payments should be increased.

One of the objections to the present condition is that the old-age insurance payments to which contributions have been made in the form of taxes average about one-half of the old-age assistance payments to which no contribution is made. One of the purposes is to make the old-age assistance insurance more popular and more attractive by bringing those payments up to a realistic level. Certainly they should be above the old-age assistance payments.

There seems to be no reason to increase old-age assistance payments at this time. The committee made a slight increase in the dependent-children program which has not been entirely satisfactory or sufficiently large to cover all the needy cases throughout the States. Instead of approximately $225,000,000 in the House bill, the Senate bill increases the total Federal payments by only $36,000,000. The bill also increases the authorization for services for crippled children, for services for maternal and child health services, and for child welfare services. Those are programs which involve no cash payments to anyone, but simply enable the States to conduct a more comprehensive and satisfactory service in these fields where the need of assistance and State action are clearly recognized.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the bill provide for any reduction in Federal contributions?

Mr. TAFT. No. Old-age assistance is left as it is, and I think the same is true as to the blind. There is a slight increase for assistance to dependent children, and there is an increased authorization for the services to which I have just referred.

I feel that the bill carries out general pledges which have been made by both parties, and I also think it moves in the right direction. The only thing I do not like about the bill is the fact that it still adheres to the so-called social-insurance program. I do not believe it is insurance, and I think the sooner we recognize that old-age pensions are desired by the people on a pay-as-you-go basis, on a universal basis, the better off we shall be. I think social insurance is not, in fact, insurance. It is not anything in the world but the taxing of people to provide free services to other people.

I do not like to have old-age pensions, which are popular and necessary, and of which I approve, used as a basis for extending so-called social insurance to all kinds of other fields of social welfare, and increasing the tremendous expense of welfare service beyond the present means of the people of the country. I do not believe the Federal Government ought to become more involved than it is in the general problem of providing welfare services and providing for the needy throughout the entire Nation.

As I say, this old-age system is not insurance. It started out to be an actuarily sound fund. The fund was to be established by the people who paid taxes in, and then when it reached the proper point they were to take out what they were entitled to as a result of having paid something into the fund. That was very soon abandoned, because the fund was impossible to administer.

If we should try to have an actuarily sound fund invested in good property, it would get up into the neighborhood of $100,000,000,000, and very soon the fund would own all the property, stocks, and bonds in the United States. It was soon recognized that that could not be done. We could not actually buy all those stocks, so the fund was to be invested in Government bonds. That was nothing but a collection of Government I O U's. We collected a tax, put the tax into the fund, then took the cash out of the fund and put it in Government bonds. Then the Treasury spends the money taken out of the fund. When we come to try to cash in on the fund, we have to tax the people again to pay the interest or the principal on the bonds in the fund. In the last analysis, the fact is that where we have a widely spread old-age pension system and undertake to pay persons over 65 years of age when they are not working, the sum is so large that it is impossible to handle on an actuarily sound basis. In the long run we have to recognize that the only way to pay those sums is for the people who are working at the time to pay the benefits for the people who are not working. There is no other way to do it. We may as well recognize that at the beginning. If we are going to pay old-age pensions, the only way to do it is to pay it out of contributions of the people who are earning money at the time.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator if I correctly understand his position. Is the Senator proposing that hereafter those presently working will be taxed to pay benefits to those who are 65 and over, but at the same time those presently working will not be contributing to their own retirement benefits?

Mr. TAFT. That is correct. I would favor a universal old-age pension system. At the same time, we might just as well recognize what we are doing. In the old days children were supposed to take care of their parents. That was sometimes done, and sometimes it was not done. Sometimes there were no children to assume the responsibility. For that system we should substitute a system under which all the people under 65 are undertaking to say they will pay old-age pensions to everyone over 65, hoping that when they reach the age of 65 the people who are at that time working will assume the same obligation.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I understand the Senator to take the position that the contributions made by individuals through the years have no relation to their ultimate pensions.

Mr. TAFT. I think there is a slight relation, but the benefits which are paid have only a slight relation to what a man pays in.

I should like to read from a speech made by Representative CARL T. CURTIS, of Nebraska, in the House of Representatives. He said:

> Let us consider the case of a man who is now 40 years of age. Let us assume that he has been under old-age and survivors insurance since it started in 1937, that he and his wife are the same age, and that both will reach 65 at the same time. We will also assume that his average monthly wage has been $200. This man will have paid in in taxes according to the schedule in the present law a sum of $1,440, and his employer a like amount, or a total of $2,880.
> This amount would have purchased him a monthly benefit of $14.10 on an actuarial basis. However, under existing law he would draw $47.95 a month, and his wife would draw $23.98, or a total of $71.93. In less than 3½ years he and his wife would draw out everything that he and his employer have paid in, even though he would have been covered for 37 long years. The actuaries say that the total value of all these benefits under existing law is $9,770. Under the pending measure his benefits will be raised to $71.10 a month, his wife's to $35.60 a month, or a total of $106.70 a month.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Do I correctly understand that the Senator from Ohio would favor a flat pension for everyone, or would he favor a graduated pension?

Mr. TAFT. I favor universal pensions, but the question of whether the pension should be flat or graduated should be studied by the committee which is proposed to be established under our proposal and which, as I understand, has been approved by the Finance Committee and will be considered by the Senate at about the same time we vote on the bill itself.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to hear the Senator refer to a committee for studying the question.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator asked about a universal pension system. A flat pension system is in force in England today, but the conditions in England are much more uniform than they are in sections of the United States. I personally, at the moment, should be inclined to favor a flat minimum and then have an increased benefit as people have paid taxes during their life or as they have earned money during the 10 years prior to the time they retired. Under that rule there would be some relation to the amount paid in. I think some relation should be recognized. But it is not very close. Take the case of a man with an average wage of $50 a month. He pays in a tax matched by his employer. The total tax paid in is $60 by each, or $120 over a 10-year period. Under the pending bill he would receive retirement pay of $22 a month instead of $20. If he has a wife who is over 65 years of age, he would get $33 a month. On the other hand, a man earning $100 a month pays in $120, twice as much as does the man earning $50 a month. He retires on only $27.50 a month, instead of $22.50 a month which the other fellow gets. There is practically no relation between what he has paid in and what he gets.

Under the new bill, the same thing is roughly true. A man with $100 average monthly wage would pay $432 and would receive $50 a month on retirement. On the other hand, a man with $200 monthly average wage would pay, or have paid for him, twice as much, or $864, but his benefit would be only $65 a month. For the same payment the first man might get $75 a month for half the money paid in by the single man under the proposed bill.

What I want to point out is that this bill already has gone far toward recognizing the principle of paying to those over 65 years of age a pension, with little relation to what they paid in during their life. In other words, it is no longer insurance. It is something called social insurance. It is not insurance, and, at least up to date, this system has not been very social either, because it has covered only a very small portion of the total number of people who are over 65 years of age.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Did I understand the Senator to say that he disapproves of disability insurance? If so, how does the situation differ between someone who is disabled and someone who is 65 years of age and cannot earn a living?

Mr. TAFT. It is a different subject. In England today they have, I think, eight different payments for social insurance.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am speaking only of total disability, in the case of a man who is unable to earn a living.

Mr. TAFT. Why take permanent disability? Why not medical services? Why not the whole gamut? People are using the term "social insurance" to cover everything. Social insurance is used as a means of saying that we are going to levy a Federal tax to pay Federal benefits to people for particular things. That is not a Federal field fundamentally. We have accepted the principle in old-age pensions for people over 65. We have not accepted it in general relief, in hardship cases, or in hundreds of other instances which may require action by State and local authorities.

As I see it, the general problem of taking care of the unfortunate is primarily one for the States, and ought to be administered by them. We ought not to have a national system. In the case of old-age pensions, the people have thought that it should be a national program, and they have made it a national program. But the moment we use the insurance idea as an excuse to cover other benefits, we shall have the Federal Government take over the entire welfare activities of the United States. We shall be doing the whole thing in Washington, and we shall be administering it from here. It would cost us about three times as much as it would if we left it with the States and assisted them in those fields.

I am willing to consider the general problem of how far the Federal Government should help the States in the matter of permanent disability as a matter of State aid. However, permanent disability is a very minor factor. In total money, it is very small, and it is well within the financial capacity of the States to look after. I see no particular reason, on the basis of necessity, why the Federal Government should be invited in.

The point I have been trying to make is that this bill does not provide insurance, and the sooner we get back to the recognition that what we are doing is simply debating an old-age pension policy and not any general theory of social insurance, the better off we will be.

I regret that we are calling this a social insurance bill. The fact is that the changes that have been made show it is not insurance. Take one thing, for example. Take the fact that we are doubling these payments. If the payments under the old-age and survivors insurance program paid for the benefits, and were intended to pay for the benefits, then certainly we could not double the benefits and maintain that principle. Even if they paid in enough to get the benefit they are supposed to get under the old system, we are now going to give them twice as much. In other words, we are recognizing in this bill that we have an obligation to pay old-age pensions to people who are old, simply because they are old and not because they paid money into the fund.

The one thing I do like about the bill is that it does establish that principle. It destroys the whole idea of insurance even while it uses the term "insurance." It puts it on the basis of old-age pension, and therefore moves in the direction of universal pension for all over 65, which I think we ought to adopt. I might say that I believe the Committee on Finance would agree with that point of view. The argument which was made against it, and which prevailed, properly so, was that it required such a complete study and such a complete change in the present system that it could not possibly be done in 4 months. We are not going to stay here 4 months longer this year. We felt something ought to be done about the inequities of the present system. The House committee has not even considered plans of that kind, so far as I know. Therefore, they would have to consider the whole thing if we tried to change the system now. However, as I see it, the bill destroys the whole theory of insurance. It recognizes an obligation. Under the new start principle, a man who pays in practically nothing will get $70 a month. Why should we not give the man who does not pay in anything $70 a month, or at least $65 a month? As I see it, we have practically destroyed the theory of social insurance. All I regret is that we still use the name "insurance" when as a matter of fact there is no insurance about it.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I am sure the Senator from Ohio, like all the others of us, has received many communications from people who complain that while they contribute to the cost of the social-security program in the form of increased prices for social services and goods, they are not able to get any of the protection which is afforded by such a program. I further understand that many people have not been covered—and in this class would fall part-time farmers—simply because the committee has not been able to work out any administrative procedure for covering this large number of people. Did the Senator state whether in his opinion a universal program of pensions on a pay-as-you-go basis would afford equitable protection to all these people, whereas at present under the actuarial insurance program no way has been found to extend this protection?

Mr. TAFT. Yes. A universal system would extend to all. It would cover a migrant farm worker as well as a permanent farm worker. In this bill we have not included farmers, because it was not at all clear that they wanted to be included, and we did not include the migratory farm worker because, while I am sure they would like to be included if they could be included, it seemed to us to be very difficult to work out a system with respect to them. We felt we should start to move piece by piece. We included about 900,000 permanent farm workers, covering men who work substantially for the same farmer the year round. In those cases I think we would be covering only about 20 percent of the farmers. Those farmers would have to make returns and pay taxes for their permanent employees. That seemed to us to be practical. Of course, those are the same farmers who keep proper books anyway. It represents the top 20 percent of the farmers. It seemed to us to be a practical thing to do. Those farmers would keep proper books, just as the storekeeper would keep books, for example, for the men in his employ. Various plans were proposed for stamp books, for example, which migratory workers would be expected to carry around with them, but it was questioned whether any of them would keep those books permanently.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The fact that farmers have not come forward in large numbers to ask to be covered under social-security programs does not indicate that they do not feel they are entitled to protection on an equitable basis with other groups of people. It simply means that they themselves cannot see how such a program could be worked out, and I am of the opinion that if a universal program, on a pay-as-you-go basis, can be developed, then we will find the farmers in much larger numbers coming forward and saying, "This looks to us as if it would work. We would like to go under it." But they do not want to urge a program which appears administratively impossible, so far as they are concerned.

Mr. TAFT. I think they are right in saying that the payroll tax, while it seems to fall on the employer and employee, really is pretty generally covered into the cost of production. The wages are calculated on a take-home-pay basis. Of course, what the employer pays for himself is included in the cost of production for everybody in the industry, but it adds to the cost, and the consumer pays it.

I believe the National Grange and the Farm Bureau Federation, which were originally opposed to the inclusion of the farmers, favor it today, largely because they think that the farmer, on the basis of prices paid, is helping to pay for the benefits, and is not getting the benefits. I think that is a legitimate complaint. But it would be taken care of in such a universal system as I am suggesting, and toward which we are moving. We are not there yet, but the pending bill moves in that direction.

Mr. AIKEN. The farmers are fully aware of the unfairness of the present program, whereby they pay their share of the cost for the protection of less than a third of the people. There is no inclination on their part, so far as I can see, to deprive of the benefits those who are now getting social-security benefits, but I believe, and I think I can say from first-hand knowledge, that they would be very much in favor of a program which covered all people equitably, and in which all people shared the expenses equitably.

Mr. TAFT. That may be, although we now find that there has not been a great deal of discussion among farmers. We received some letters from farmers for, and some letters from farmers against. The organizations which appeared before the committee favored the program, but they had opposed it in the past, and they have not been what we might call pressing it very hard.

Of course, when we take 7,000,000 farmers and they all have to pay 2¼ percent tax on their incomes, and not get any benefits, on an average, for about 25 or 30 years, we might find opposition among them to that 2¼ percent tax, which would have to be imposed on them if they were included. So I am not certain that they want it. Whether they do or not I do not know.

Mr. AIKEN. Let me suggest that it is the bookkeeping rather than the tax which makes some of them reluctant to approve the present program.

Mr. TAFT. I think they are correct about that. So in covering only the permanent farm laborers, we have included those working for only 20 percent of the farmers, those who are best off, and probably can keep their records clear.

Mr. President, as I have said, I regret that this is called an insurance program. I think the bill moves toward the universal pension system without getting to it. I do not care to call it insurance, because I do not think it should be taken as a precedent for the extension of insurance to all the other services.

I have here the British plan, and while I am not quite certain that this is exactly what is in effect today, roughly speaking, they have social insurance now for unemployment benefits, including training and rehabilitation.

They have a program for disability benefits, both permanent and temporary, other than industrial.

They have industrial disability benefit pensions and grants, similar to the workman's compensation program which we have in Ohio.

They have retirement pensions, that is, old-age pensions.

They have widows' and guardians' benefits, which are somewhat similar to the survivors' part of our program.

They have a maternity grant and benefit provision. When a woman has a baby, she is insured against the cost of having the baby.

Then there is a marriage grant. I do not know exactly what that is, but apparently it is insurance to pay for the marriage license, or it may be that it is to pay for the honeymoon, I am not certain which. I do not believe it is insurance against the perils of marriage.

Then there is a funeral benefit, to bury one when he dies.

In addition to that, they have national assistance similar to our old-age assistance.

Then they have children's allowances, so that everyone who has a dependent child receives a benefit, except, I think, perhaps, the man who is working does not get any benefit for the first child, but he gets money to help him support additional children.

Then, of course, they have the medical service, which is an additional form of insurance, or is so considered here.

I do not think we should recognize for a moment the social-insurance principle as a good thing in itself. There is an effort to bring all these programs under social insurance, because people think insurance is a nice thing and does not cost anyone anything, if they can pay for it as it goes, whereas the fact is that it is merely another Federal program taxing the people to pay benefits to other people who are not working, and give them something for nothing.

Mr. President, I think it is important that we do not use whatever we do here as a precedent to extend it to other fields of operation. I think it is important, therefore, that it be not extended to permanent-disability insurance, which is included in the House bill. If we extend it to permanent-disability insurance, then we are going to have to extend it to temporary disability, which means we would pay a man's wages while he is sick or thinks he is sick. Then we move right on to the whole medical program, and pay for his doctor and pay his hospital bill, until the cost of the whole program is something beyond conception.

Just the program we have outlined here today in the pending bill will result in the payment of old-age pensions in 1952, when it goes into full effect, of $2,236,000,000. In 1952 we will tax the people in payroll taxes about $3,000,000,000, and we will pay out $2,236,000,000. In addition to that, we will pay about a billion dollars in Federal contributions for old-age assistance. So that the Federal Government will be paying for old-age benefits approximately $3,200,000,000.

If that is extended to a universal basis, it will be more expensive. I do not think it will be a great deal more expensive, if the benefits are not too large. The present bill's program grows until in 1960 we will be paying $3,700,000,000, and by 1990 we will be paying $10,000,000,000. In other words, it is extremely expensive to support people over 65 years of age who are not working.

It is a program I am willing to see the Government undertake, and I think it is one the people are willing to have the Government undertake, but I do not think that before it gets established we should extend it into other fields which properly belong to the States and the localities, where the obligations are being assumed today by charitable institutions in many cases, by denominational hospitals of all kinds, by the local governments, and by State governments.

Mr. President, I wish to say also that it seems to me clear that we should not increase the allowances we have made for assistance to the States for old-age pensions, or otherwise. The Federal Government has a deficit today of $6,000,000,000. The States are able to get along, at least, and I see no reason why the Federal contribution to the things the States are doing should be any larger than it is today.

Mr. President, there is one other subject which is likely to come before the Senate, the proposal to increase the wage base from $3,000 to $4,200 or $4,800. Today a man's taxes are figured on his actual wages up to $3,000 a year. If he gets more than $3,000 a year, they are still figured on $3,000 a year. That means that the total tax paid today is 3 percent of $3,000, or about $90 per annum for any man. It is a system favorable to persons with very low incomes. On the first $100 a month of the average monthly wage an individual gets $50 a month in benefits when he retires. On the amount over $100 of the monthly average wage the Senate bill increases the rate from 10 percent to 15 percent. So he receives 50 percent of the first $100 and 15 percent of the next $250. If the amount were increased from $3,000 to $4,200–$4,800 the result, of course, would be to increase the tax proportionately. The man who actually receives a $5,000 income, instead of paying $90, will pay $108. He will pay on the $3,600 figure. But when he comes to receive his benefit he receives only 15 percent of the additional $600.

Roughly speaking, it is doubtful whether he receives any benefit. The additional tax he would pay over and above what he would have paid on $3,000 is so large that, although I am not entirely certain, he could buy insurance from private companies for the additional benefit more cheaply than he receives it from the system.

Mr. President, I do not think it is a vital matter. The Senate committee felt it was better to leave the figure at $3,000. In the first place, there are many private pension funds which are integrated into the $3,000 level and they would all have to be changed.

The chief effect of increasing the $3,000 simply seems to be an increase in taxes on everyone who is receiving more than $3,000. It is of no particular benefit to those receiving more than $3,000. So I do not regard it is a matter of vital importance, but, on the whole, I see no reason to increase the wage base beyond $3,000. The House increased it to $3,600, but by providing 15 percent instead of 10 percent we give a $3,600 man just as large a benefit under our bill as he was receiving under the House bill with the 10 percent on a somewhat larger base. So that, so far as I can see, the increase in that base is not actually going to give anyone any greater benefits than he receives today, except to the extent perhaps that he pays a much larger tax to receive it.

Mr. President, I feel that we have in this bill fulfilled our obligations, carried out the policy of the Republican Party, and, I think, carried out also the policy of the Democratic Party. In this bill I feel that we are moving in the right direction. I voted for every increase in coverage, I think, because I contend that in the end we ought to cover everyone.

I believe we should insist upon a commission to study the whole problem of a universal pension. I think it can be worked out. I think it can be worked out with very little additional expenditure by the Federal Government over what is being paid today. I think it can be worked out so as to relieve the Federal Government of the $900,000,000 a year which today we are paying to the States to make the old-age assistance payments. I am only guessing, but I should think that, whereas in 1952 the present program would cost us $3,200,000,000, for somewhere between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 a year we can provide a universal old-age pension.

I believe, therefore, that we should pass the bill as a step in the right direction. I believe we should pass it to eliminate many of the inequities and hardships created by the present system. I believe we should enact it, if for no other reason, simply to bring the figures into accord with the present cost of living. I believe, therefore, that it is a reasonable program carried out on the principles of an old-age pension which we have long adopted in this country. I think we should adhere to the Senate bill substantially. I do not mean to say that many minor amendments are not necessary, but I do not believe we should undertake an extension of the field of disability insurance or other possible phases of coverage. I think as soon as possible we should wipe out the whole idea that this is insurance, and adopt a universal old-age-pension system.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant journal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Malone
Benton	Hickenlooper	Martin
Brewster	Hill	Maybank

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] for himself and other Senators.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Georgia yield at this time for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, we have just had a quorum call. Some reference was made by the distinguished majority leader to the effect that a unanimous-consent agreement might be worked out, agreeable to Members of the Senate, to vote on all amendments and also on final passage of the pending bill. Does not the distinguished Senator from Georgia feel that this would be a proper time to present the request which has been worked out? I hope it will be satisfactory to Members of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am pleased to present the unanimous-consent request at this time. It is agreeable to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the leader on the minority side of the committee. I send to the desk the proposed agreement and ask that it be read.

The proposed unanimous-consent agreement was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

Ordered, That on the calendar day of Tuesday, June 20, 1950, at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., in connection with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance System, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, the Senate proceed to vote upon a resolution (S. Res.) sanctioned by the Senate Committee on Finance, and to be offered by Senators GEORGE and MILLIKIN, authorizing and directing that said committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall continue the study and investigation of social security problems in the United States on general and specific subjects to be described in said resolution, with authorization for employment of such technical, clerical, and other assistance as said committee deems advisable, with authority, for the purposes of the resolution, with the approval of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to request the use of services, information, facilities, and personnel of departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government, and with provision for the expenses of such investigation, or any amendment that may be proposed thereto; and immediately thereafter proceed to vote, without further debate, except as hereinafter provided, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the foregoing bill H. R. 6000, and upon the final passage of said bill: Provided, That no vote on any amendment or motion shall be had prior to said hour of 4 p. m. on said day; that no amendment that is not germane to the subject matter of the bill shall be in order.

Ordered further, That the time between 12 noon and 4 p. m. on said day be equally divided and controlled by Mr. GEORGE and Mr. MILLIKIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I address a question to the senior Senator from Georgia?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. Will the resolution, referred to in the proposed agreement, when it becomes the pending business before the Senate, be subject to amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. It will be, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wonder whether the Senator from Georgia would be willing to modify the request so as to permit 5 minutes to each side of any amendment that may be offered, for purposes of explanation?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to that. If it is agreeable to other Senators, I shall be glad to modify the request in accordance with the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That is entirely agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the proposed agreement will be modified accordingly. Is there objection to the unanimous consent agreement, as modified. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement, as modified, is as follows:

Ordered, That on the calendar day of Tuesday, June 20, 1950, at the hour of 4 o'clock p. m., in connection with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal Old-Age and Survivors Insurance System, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, the Senate proceed to vote upon a resolution (S. Res.) sanctioned by the Senate Committee on Finance, and to be offered by Senators GEORGE and MILLIKIN, authorizing and directing that said committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall continue the study and investigation of social security problems in the United States on general and specific subjects to be described in said resolution, with authorization for employment of such technical, clerical, and other assistance as said committee deems advisable, with authority, for the purposes of the resolution, with the approval of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to request the use of services, information, facilities, and personnel of departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government, and with provision for the expenses of such investigation, or any amendment that may be proposed thereto; and immediately thereafter proceed to vote, without further debate, except as hereinafter provided, upon any amendment or motion that may be pending or that may be proposed to the foregoing bill H. R. 6000, and upon the final passage of said bill: Provided, That no vote on any amendment or motion shall be had prior to said hour of 4 p. m. on said day; that no amendment that is not germane to the subject matter of the bill shall be in order; and that after said hour of 4 o'clock p. m., debate on any amendment or motion shall be limited to not exceeding 10 minutes, to be equally divided between the mover thereof and the Chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Ordered further, That the time between 12 noon and 4 p. m. on said day be equally divided and controlled by Mr. GEORGE and Mr. MILLIKIN.

ORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY AND THE DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8198) to provide for the organization of the Army and the Department of the Army, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, on June 8, the Senate passed House bill 8198, with an amendment. On June 12 the House requested a conference, and appointed conferees. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the following conferees on the part of the Senate: Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. CAIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, am I correct that there is a disagreement on the amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator from Maryland care to give us a brief explanation of it?

Mr. TYDINGS. I regret that I am unable to do so at the moment.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the Senator from Maryland whether I understood correctly that he moved that a certain list of Senators designated by him be appointed conferees on the part of the Senate? I understood the Senator to say "the following conferees."

Mr. TYDINGS. The reason the names of the conferees were suggested is that the Senator from Maryland has combed the Armed Services Committee for volunteers. The other members of the committee are tied up, and those listed are the only ones who want to serve. For that reason, I have taken the liberty of suggesting the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I shall not object. However, I have some question as to the advisability of introducing into a motion, as matter of custom, a list of Senators, thus depriving the Presiding Officer of the right to select conferees.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Chair has the right to appoint conferees. What the Senator from Maryland did was simply by way of suggestion and to accommodate members of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. DONNELL. Would the Senator from Maryland have any objection to rephrasing his motion to state that he moves the appointment of conferees and suggests to the Chair a certain list, rather than making it mandatory?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not think I suggested that the Chair should appoint the conferees whose names I sent to the desk. I sent the list to the desk in an attempt to aid the Chair in appointing conferees.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield again, I think the Senator said—and I most respectfully say this—that he moved that the Chair appoint "the following conferees."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I withdraw my previous motion, and move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, request a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. CAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSING AND RENT ACT OF 1947

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, earlier today, when the amendment of the House to Senate bill 3181, the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, was laid before the Senate, I made a unanimous-consent request, because the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] was about to speak and I did not desire to take up too much of his time, that the Senate disagree to the House amendment to extend rent control for 7 months——

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. Let me finish my statement, please.

I now ask, Mr. President, that action on the matter be taken at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House amendment to Senate bill 3181, to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes, has heretofore today been laid before the Senate, and is now before the Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House providing for an extension of rent control for 7 months, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. When the distinguished Senator from South Carolina made a similar motion earlier today a motion was made by the junior Senator from Nebraska in behalf of the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN]. In view of the fact that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] did not yield at that time, there is no record of any action on the matter being taken prior to this time. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina yield?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, earlier in the day it had been the intention of the junior Senator from Washington to move, with reference to the bill which the Chair has laid before the Senate, that the Senate strike out the 7-month provision recommended by the House and insist on the 6-month provision which the Senate had agreed to on one of the latter days of last week. Since, earlier this morning, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] and the junior Senator from Washington have been in consultation regarding this question. It is the wish of the senior Senator from South Carolina that the bill go to conference at a very early date, and the junior Senator from Washington is by no means endeavoring to obstruct, but it was the agreement that the Senator from Washington might be permitted to pose several questions to the Senator from South Carolina at this time.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is correct.

Mr. CAIN. With the permission of the Senator, I should like to pose the first question, which is this: If the conference report includes a provision extending Federal rent controls for 7 months beyond June 30, 1950, rather than for the period of 6 months which had been agreed to by the Senate, does the senior Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, believe that such a conference report ought then to be rejected?

Mr. MAYBANK. Of course, I can speak only for myself. I desire to say that I opposed a 7-month extension in the committee. I am personally opposed to a 7-month extension. I think there were only three members of the committee who favored a 7-month extension. The committee was of the belief that a 6-month extension was sufficient.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I have two further questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MAYBANK. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. On the question of an extension of 7 months, it is important to realize that States whose legislative bodies do not convene until 1951 would be compelled to call special sessions, in the event Federal rent controls were removed as of December 31. In the event Federal rent controls were extended for 7 months, the State legislative bodies could convene and deal with the question and not be compelled to go to the expense of calling special sessions.

In a colloquy with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], prior to the vote on the rent-control bill, I suggested that rent control should be extended 7 months rather than 6 months. The House accepted such an amendment offered by Representative JUDD, of Minnesota. I think the Senate conferees might well consider favorably such an amendment or such a provision when the bill is in conference.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. MAYBANK. With all my great respect for my distinguished friend from Minnesota, I want to say that the Senate voted overwhelmingly for a 6-months' extension, and I think we are bound by the vote of the Senate. It was discussed on the Senate floor. I am bound by all moral obligations to favor the 6-months' extension. I appreciate what the Senator from Minnesota has said and I also appreciate the statement of the Governor of Minnesota before the committee.

Mr. THYE. The governor is going to testify before the committee with reference to flood disasters in Minnesota. He will appear before the committee at 2:30 o'clock this afternoon. The governor is present, and I should like to have him show the Senator from South Carolina that rent control extension should be for 7 months rather than for 6 months.

Mr. MAYBANK. That may be correct, but the Senate voted for a 6 months' extension. It will be a pleasure for me to meet the governor and to hear his testimony before the committee this afternoon.

Mr. THYE. If the Senator will yield further, I did not press for the amendment on the floor of the Senate, because I realized it would not meet with a friendly reception, and possibly it would be defeated, and, if it were, our opportunity would be lost. So Representative JUDD offered such an amendment in the House and it received a very favorable reception. There were not to exceed two or three votes against the amendment. I believe it is a reasonable extension, and I am sorry that I cannot convince the able chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency that he should accept the amendment.

Mr. MAYBANK. I can at least assure my distinguished friend from Minnesota and his distinguished governor that there will be some sort of control for the large cities and other communities in Minnesota until they can determine for themselves what they wish to do.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I think the questions and answers as between the Senator from Washington and the Senator from South Carolina are extremely important as we move toward final action on the pending question, which concerns itself with federalized rent controls. I am satisfied that the Senator from South Carolina will not misunderstand my second question, and I am inclined to think that he will wish to respond to it. If by any chance the conference report should include a provision extending Federal rent controls for 7 months, rather than for 6 months, would the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the senior Senator from South Carolina, be disposed to join with the junior Senator from Washington and other Senators in resisting the conference report in every legitimate and conceivable way? The junior Senator from Washington, sir—and I think it can be understood why—is tremendously interested in determining the actual situation.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, my only thought with respect to that question which the Senator from Washington has asked me is that in committee I personally opposed a 7-month extension of rent control. I suggested it would be unwise to have such a provision come to the Senate. So far as I am concerned, I am not in favor of a 7-month extension. However, what the conference committee will do is something I do not know. I cannot answer for them. My judgment would be that I would do the best I could to have it made a 6-month extension.

Mr. CAIN. Would the senior Senator from South Carolina venture a guess as to whether in his own opinion there is likely to be or not to be a Federal rent-control law beyond June 30, 1950, if the conference report includes a recommended extension of 7 months instead of 6 months?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is rather a hard question to answer. I do not know who is going to be in the House or who is going to be in the Senate after January 1. I am in the fortunate position of not having to run for office this year. I hope our friends will return and be with us. If the Senator is asking me who is going to come back and who is not going to come back, he is asking me a very difficult question, the answer to which, of course, I do not know. I do not know what the new Congress will do. I will say this, however: That I am in favor of a 6-month extension, and I shall vote for such an extension.

Mr. CAIN. The substance of my question was misunderstood only in part by the senior Senator from South Carolina. What I am endeavoring to find out is if the conference report comes back with a provision extending the rent-control law for 7 months, does the senior Senator from South Carolina feel that such a conference report would be adopted by the Senate of the United States? It seems to me that if that conference report were rejected there would be no Federal rent-control law beyond June 30.

Mr. MAYBANK. I cannot speak for other Senators, and I do not know what the House will do. I do not not know whom the Presiding Officer is going to appoint on the conference committee. Being chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency I presume I shall be one of the conferees. If so, I shall hold out to the end for a 6 months' rent-control law. I think that we shall have to have some sort of rent control in some of the larger cities and in some of the States where there has been no opportunity to vote as yet because the legislatures have not met, or where the governor did not have the power to call a special session of the legislature. I think that the local communities and States should take over rent control. That is what we intended last year they should do. However, as I said, we were met with the unfortunate situation of some State legislatures not having met, for example.

Mr. CAIN. I have one other question, Mr. President. If the conference report should return to the floor of the Senate with a provision extending the rent-control law 7 months, would the senior Senator from South Carolina think it unbecoming, unwise, or unreasonable for any single Senator to work in every conceivable and legitimate way to have such conference report rejected by the Senate of the United States, for the fundamental reason that the issue as between 6 and 7 months was previously decided within the Committee on Banking and Currency and was recently resolved on the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. MAYBANK. I would say that I would agree that the Senate voted for a 6 months' extension, that the Committee on Banking and Currency had the question of a 7 months' extension before it, and that the proposal was defeated in committee. In fact, there were very few Senators who favored a 7 months' extension. As the Senator from Washington has ably stated, I think it would be the duty of any Senator to oppose to the best of his ability anything which the Senate had not approved.

Mr. CAIN. Because of the gracious way in which the senior Senator from South Carolina has answered the questions posed to him by the junior Senator from Washington, and because of the substance included within the responses which the junior Senator from Washington has secured from his friend from South Carolina, the junior Senator from Washington is no longer disposed to move that the Senate strike out the 7 months provision sent to the Senate this morning by the House, but favors the recommended action of the Senator from South Carolina that the bill now go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MAYBANK, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. FLANDERS, and Mr. ERICKER conferees on the part of the Senate.

SURVEY OF ECA IN EUROPE

Mr. MCCARRAN. Mr. President, last fall I spent approximately 3 months in western Europe. As chairman of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, I spent much time inquiring into the problems connected with the economic assistance which we have been giving to western Europe. Subsequently, I wrote a brief report on that part of my trip. This report is entitled "Survey of ECA in Europe by Senator PAT MCCARRAN," and is Senate Document No. 141.

Mr. President, the Senate will presently be called upon to decide how much money to give to our western European allies for the fiscal year 1950–1951. As I have said again and again, I am in favor of continuing to aid western Europe in its efforts to become and remain economically healthy. However, during my trip last fall I became convinced that complete economic stability for western Europe by 1952 is an impossibility, and I said so in my report of my trip. I, therefore, concluded that further reductions in the amount of aid to be given western Europe in the final 2 years of the Marshall plan would be desirable if for no other reason than that such reductions would materially lessen the shock of final termination of aid in 1952.

So that my "Survey of ECA in Europe" may be read and understood by the Members of Congress, I respectfully request unanimous consent that the entire report which I made following my return from Europe be inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SURVEY OF ECA IN EUROPE BY SENATOR PAT MCCARRAN

SCOPE OF STUDY

This report covers my travels in the participating countries during the period September, October, and November. In studying the progress and administration of the ECA in the principal countries, I conferred with the officials of the ECA, the State Department, Department of National Defense, and other United States agencies having first-hand knowledge of the facts, as well as with the government officials of the various countries. More important, I attempted to reach the grass roots, so to speak, of these countries and determine the general feeling of the various peoples as to their understanding of the programs of the United States and their evaluation of the progress their countries are making in economic stabilization.

To the occasional tourist, European recovery appears well along the way. Generally speaking, there is high employment. Production, both industrial and agricultural, is on the increase. An American traveler finds many items scarce or difficult to obtain. Such items ofttimes are considered ordinary requirements in the United States. However, there is a question whether Europe, at any time, could meet such American requirements inasmuch as they are considered more or less luxuries in Europe.

The businessman traveling in Europe may have a somewhat different idea as to the progress of recovery, particularly if he is engaged in a business which requires the transfer between countries of goods, services, or moneys. He, of course, is met with quotas, restrictions, currency control, and many other barriers to the normal flow of business.

Although I can report considerable, even greater than hoped for, progress toward recovery in Europe, general observations concerning the over-all accomplishments of ECA are apt to be misleading unless made with respect to each country.

PRINCIPAL COUNTRIES STUDIED

France

I arrived in France on September 19 and, before proceeding to Paris, I spent the twentieth and twenty-first in the Normandy section of France. During this time I visited agricultural fairs which were being conducted at this time of year. I discussed with visitors to the fair general conditions and attempted to determine the morale of the average Frenchman from this sort of contact.

I conferred with Mr. Andre, a member of the French Senate, who represented this district, and I attempted to secure his views concerning the economic recovery of France.

On September 22 I met with the chief of the ECA French mission in Paris, Mr. Barry Bingham. I also conferred with Mr. David Bruce, our Ambassador to France, and later with Milton Katz, deputy to Ambassador W. Averell Harriman. Conferences were held with these gentlemen concerning the progress of recovery, the general morale of the people, and the problems immediately confronting the mission in the administration of the present program. On the following day I met with members of Mr. Harriman's staff of the office of the special representative, as well as with additional members of the mission staff, and discussed the industrial and agricultural conditions of France.

In the afternoon I conferred with Mr. Jean Monnet, who is a member of the Prime Minister's council and chief of the planning division for modernization and equipment of French industry. Mr. Monnet is best known for his authorship of what is known as the Monnet plan. Mr. Monnet reported to me considerable progress on his plan of modernization and industrial equipment and was outspoken in his position that the Marshall plan should be ended not later than 1952, and that the participating countries would be well advised to proceed on such an assumption.

Following the conference with Mr. Monnet, I conferred further with Mr. Barry Bingham, chief of the mission; his deputy, Mr. B. E. Lane Timmons; Mr. Kenneth J. Nicholson, chief of food and agriculture branch; Mr. Andrew F. Patterson, controller; Mr. Clay H. Hollister, chief of the industry division; and Mr. Kenneth Douty, chief of the labor division. The discussion of these meetings went into the development of hydroelectric power in France, the financial situation in France, its long-range agricultural program, and the information program. The matter of the role of French labor in the future of France was also discussed at length by Mr. Douty, who impressed me as being a most capable and able administrator in the labor field.

On September 26 I conferred with Premier Queuille. My discussions with the Premier covered the principal facets of the ECA program in France, the prospects for the French economy, and the inevitable termination of Marshall-plan aid.

France presents a very difficult picture from the standpoint of evaluating her economic progress. Unquestionably, recovery has been considerable. In nearly every respect, the economy has shown remarkable improvements over 1948 and earlier postwar years. In 1949, gross national product increased over 1948 approximately 9 percent. Balance of payments showed improvement with an over-all increase in exports of more than 40 percent. The internal financial situation was, in relation to prior years, reasonably stable and, for the first time since 1935, the general price level at the end of the year was not significantly higher than at the end of the previous year. Although there was some labor agitation in the fall of 1949, the year was not marred by crippling strikes of long duration similar to those of 1947 and 1948. Investment increased moderately. Two economic fields showed no improvement during the year—that of crop production, which actually declined somewhat as a result of the drought, and exports to dollar areas reflecting dollar earnings remained practically unchanged at the 1948 level.

Industrial production ran extremely high in 1949 but the cost of this production was also extremely high and served to discount much real recovery from the standpoint of competitive economics. A reduction in the cost of production appears absolutely necessary but extremely difficult to obtain because the majority of producers are sheltered from competition by domestic and internal restrictions, which tend to curtail production rather than reduce costs.

Most fuel and raw materials bottlenecks and shortages were eliminated in the early part of the year. Electric power, however, remained on the list of shortages although production in the third quarter was running at 6,700,000,000 kilowatt-hours compared to prewar 4,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

By the second half of 1948, real consumption expenditures in France had in total reached the 1938 level. This was true on a per capita basis as well as in the aggregate. The year 1949 showed a further small increase so that the present level of living in France is estimated to be slightly above that in 1938. Per capita food consumption in 1949 was approximately at prewar levels for the most important items in the French diet; namely, cereals, meat, and potatoes. It was substantially lower, however, for fats and oils, dairy products, wine, and sugar. Per capita food consumption was higher for fresh vegetables and fruits.

Food rationing was progressively reduced during the year 1949 so that by the end of the year all items were free.

Of significant importance is the fact that food production has not kept pace with industrial production because weather conditions have not been the best for the past 2 years. Due to the unprecedented droughts, the improvement programed during the ECA period of assistance is falling far behind schedule. More emphasis appears necessary in the utilization of feed and the handling and use of livestock. The need for practical work in extension service is apparent. The possibility of France's becoming self-sufficient in foods is much greater than in any of the other participating countries. Such a prospect should be exploited to the utmost and an endeavor made to fill the dollar gap between exports and imports by reducing imports of food. This gap can be closed by raising more food and by more efficient use of the present production. It is recognized, of course, that the difficulty and the time required for changing the agricultural pursuits of an entire nation is great. This problem nevertheless requires immediate aggressive attention.

Direct ECA aid in 1949–50 will approximate $673,000,000, a reduction of about one-third from the previous year. Even with a reduction of one-third, the general picture presents a standard of living comparable with prewar although such a standard could not be maintained without continued American aid of equivalent proportions.

Political stability cannot be maintained on an unsound economic foundation. The present political stability must be considered in relation to the economic conditions. The balance is very delicate. Economic recession would immediately impair the political stability of the present French Government, and the soundness of the present economic situation is not such as to insure continued progress. The danger of the situation seems to be that recovery may have been too rapid and too dependent upon continued outside support in the form of American aid.

In France, as in the other countries visited, I attempted to discover among the people, in general, the attitude concerning ECA and our objectives. As pointed out in the committee report on France, Knowledge of the Marshall Plan in Europe, dated October 14, 1949, the progress in this field has not been encouraging. As a result of conferences concerning this matter, ECA is instituting a more energetic program designed to inform the French populace of the ultimate goal of ourselves and the French Government in the matter of economic recovery.

Germany

On September 27, I traveled to Germany, visiting points in France and Germany before arriving at Frankfurt in the evening of the 28th of September. During my stay in Germany, I visited Frankfurt, Munich, Stuttgart, as well as Heidelberg and other industrial cities.

I conferred in Frankfurt with John McCloy, our High Commissioner in Germany. Discussions were had with Mr. McCloy concerning the economic situation as he found it, having only recently assumed his new duties, and the perplexing problems immediately confronting him in the administration of his office, as well as the economic future of western Germany.

Following discussions with Mr. McCloy and his deputies, conferences were held with Mr. N. H. Collisson, Director of the Office of Economic Affairs, and Chief of the ECA Special Mission to Western Germany; and with Mr. Robert M. Hanes, adviser to Mr. Collisson, and the future ECA Chief in Germany, Mr. Hanes only recently having arrived to relieve Mr. Collisson. Conferences were had with Mr. Earl R. Beckner, Chief of the Manpower Division, Office of Labor Affairs; Mr. Charles Marshall of the German Desk of ECA-Washington, and temporary assistant to Mr. Collisson; Mr. Norman Olnick, Assistant Controller, ECA Special Mission to Western Germany; and Mr. Walter T. Ridder, information officer of the ECA Special Mission to Western Germany.

Discussion with these officials covered the problems of administration under the previous zonal division of western Germany as well as their plans for administration and economic development under the unified plan, and their relations with the Federal Republic of Germany.

Additional conferences were held with representatives of the Department of State and the Department of the Army, many of whom were assuming new duties or liquidating old ones due to the administrative changes in the control of Germany. My travels in Germany acquainted me with the degree of destruction, the patent evidence of recovery, as well as giving me opportunity to find out the general welfare of the people of Germany.

The economy of Germany, which is a vital segment of the economy of Europe, is slowly recovering momentum under the impetus of the new German Government augmented by ECA aid. The recent changes in administration in Germany unifying the zones and clarifying the position of ECA, should considerably increase the rate of recovery. It is not expected, however, that complete recovery and industrial production can be obtained in western Germany at the same rate of progress as in other participating countries because of the fact of the utter destruction and maladjustment immediately following the war. However, the spirit of recovery is particularly noticeable among the peoples of Germany.

Under the new Federal Republic of Germany, this Government becomes a member of the OEEC by succession rather than as a new member. This procedure was adopted so as to preserve the status of the existing trade agreements as well as the intra-European payments agreement to which Germany, acting through the Allies, had become signatory. During the period of my study in Germany, the administrative processes were not all that could be desired, because of the transfer of functions to the Office of the High Commissioner and the establishment of new organizations designed to implement the new status of Germany.

Industrial production is moving rapidly ahead in Germany. Food production has made rapid strides also. The reconstruction of bombed cities has gone forward rapidly in some areas, more slowly in others. During the period of this study, Germany had been opened to tourists. An exchange rate was established for the German mark so that tourists could spend money in and travel through Germany. Accommodations, although extremely limited because of destruction of housing facilities, appeared quite adequate. Much of the internal reconstruction of buildings, industrial plants, and cities had gone on on a more or less barter basis because of the lack of capital for capital investment. Up until the establishment of the Office of the High Commissioner, counterpart funds accruing as a result of ECA aid had been frozen and, since there was no other means of securing capital investment, activity in this field was practically at a standstill. However, since the establishment of the Office of the High Commissioner, ECA has moved into the economic picture in Germany actively and has begun to release counterpart funds for internal projects requiring capital investment. Releases since this date approximate the equivalent of $150,000,000 in German Deutschemarks.

It should be noted that the sums accruing from ECA dollar aid in the counterpart fund will not be adequate for the capital investment program necessary for complete recovery. However, the availability of these funds does lessen the problem facing the High Commissioner in this field.

Another problem of considerable importance to our High Commissioner and to the economic future of Germany has been the confused dismantling program. Dismantling of plants, other than war potential plants, should have taken place during the first year following the surrender of Germany. Where plants are operating now, and employing sizable numbers of employees, the dismantling of such a plant presents a most difficult problem from the standpoint of internal order, as well as adding to the economic disruption of an already disrupted economy. It is believed that our officials could have handled this problem in a much more efficient manner so as to lessen both the load on the American taxpayer and the problems that appear to be rising daily from a continuation of a dismantling program which should have been concluded 2 years ago.

Another problem of immediate importance to economic recovery in Germany and of particular importance to the administration of the country and to the United States High Commissioner, is that of German refugees, sometimes called Volksdeutsch or expellees. This term is used to denote Germans, numbering between 8,000,000 and 10,000,000, who have come into the western zones of Germany from the eastern zone and from eastern Europe, either forcibly or voluntarily. Present estimates indicate an influx into western Germany of from 500 to 1,000 daily. The area into which these people are coming is considerably less than the area of Germany prior to the war. This presents the Office of the High Commissioner with a considerable problem in the economic field as well as in the security field. An economic level of industry to absorb these people appears to be almost out of the question and yet the millions in this area may present a very acute problem from the standpoint of peaceful development of Germany and Europe. Indications are that the majority of these people are competent and possess considerable know-how. Consideration might be given, under the President's point 4 program, to providing facilities for emigration of vast numbers of these people to areas of the world deficient in industrial know-how.

It appears that the prospect of economic rehabilitation of Germany is much brighter because of the coordination of all the aid programs in Germany into one correlated program and, while it is safe to say, as of the present, that economic recovery is well on the way, it is quite too soon to comment upon the political trends, particularly because of the fact that the German Government has just been reestablished and it is too soon to judge accurately the political situations there.

The information program carried on by ECA in Germany appears to be in good hands. I was particularly impressed by the ability of Mr. Walter Ridder, the information officer. An excellent program has been developed under his direction and work is going on to make the people of Germany cognizant of the democratic process we are striving to foster by the ECA. A unique part of this program entails the dissemination of information in almost textbook form for use in German schools. As a result of the war and denazification, many of the textbooks in Germany required destruction and replacement. This appears to be an excellent opportunity to get the story of American democracy and the goals of the foreign policy of the United States before the rising generation of Germany.

With respect to end use, it was found that at the time of this study, ECA was employing a Swiss concern for the purpose of making end-use checks of the arrival and distribution of ECA-financed goods, as well as other imports. An examination of this method of end-use check indicated a satisfactory solution to this problem inasmuch as the costs were being borne out of counterpart funds. Since the study was completed, ECA has found it desirable to change firms and the Swiss firm is no longer employed, although independent organizations are performing the task.

With respect to export controls in Germany and their importance in the shipment and transshipment of materials of strategic importance, the findings were identical with those reported in the staff report of September 13 to the committee dealing with this problem. The Joint Export-Import Authority heretofore charged with the control of exports and imports is being liquidated under the present administration and the licensing functions of this organization are being executed through the German banks except, of course, items of critical importance which are still being licensed through the liquidating unit of JEIA. The criticisms pointed out in the above-referred-to staff report appear to be valid and there is no probability of immediate improvement until the entire problem is solved at a level higher than the country level, that is to say, until the overall policy confronting the various agencies concerned has been solved and a unified policy adopted. In this connection, it should be pointed out that ECA has adopted a more vigorous policy in solving this difficult matter.

Italy

I left Germany and proceeded to Italy, passing through Switzerland where I conferred with officials of our State Department in Geneva concerning the general conditions in Switzerland. This country, although a participating country from the standpoint of being a member of the OEEC, has not been the recipient of any aid either by grant or loan. Economic conditions appeared excellent; trade was thriving; the general standard of the populace was considerably above Europe, as a whole. The shops were comparable to shops in American cities from the standpoint of availability of supply.

I entered Italy from the north, traveling through the industrial heart of northern Italy, and conferring with members of our State Department and our consular officers as well as with ECA field representatives in this area of Italy. I attempted to observe closely the general conditions, to ascertain from the man in the street his reaction to the economic situation in Italy, his knowledge of the aid the U. S. A. is furnishing Italy, and also his concern with the future.

I proceeded through the area of the Po Valley, which is Italy's richest farming section, continuing south through Bologna, Florence, and to Rome. In Rome, I conferred with Mr. James Dunn, our Ambassador, and members of his staff; with Mr. James D. Zellerbach, Chief of the ECA Mission; and his Deputy, Mr. M. L. Dayton.

I took up the administration of the ECA program, as well as the progress achieved to date, with the following officials of the ECA Mission: Mr. Dayton; Mr. H. W. McClelland, agriculture chief; Mr. John Secondari of the Information Division; Mr. Ralph McCabe of the Program Division; Mr. G. W. Baker of the Industry Division; and Mr. James Litton, controller. Conferences concerning the progress were also held with Mr. Eric Johnston, of the Public Advisory Board of the ECA, who was at that time visiting Italy.

On successive days I conferred with Count Carlo Sforza, Minister for Foreign Affairs for Italy, and Prime Minister Alcide de Gasperi. My conferences with these officials of the Italian Government dealt with problems facing their country economically and politically, as well as the achievements to date and the future prospects of economic stability in Italy.

Evaluation of the progress in Italy requires different consideration from that of most other countries in the participating group. The people of Italy are working very hard for economic recovery. However, Italy has less to work with than most of the other countries, being entirely dependent for natural resources on areas outside of Italy. Much progress has been made toward recovery. There is a spirit of confidence in the future which is indicative of active cooperation. The agencies of the United States in Italy reflect a spirit of cooperation in the joint task of economic recovery that is indeed healthy. The work between these agencies impressed me particularly as a good example of the type of cooperation needed between all United States Government agencies in achieving the ultimate policies of the United States.

No country presents an example of the need for economic integration more vividly than Italy because of her economic position of having an overabundance of labor supply and a complete lack of resources for development.

The agricultural program in Italy has received more vigorous attention than in many of the other countries. There has been real progress in developing modern agricultural methods such as the introduction of hybrid seed corn, although the time necessary for improving agricultural production methods is necessarily long and tedious. Although the achievement to date has been limited statistically there seems to be a recognition that agricultural development is one of the primary aspects of recovery, and it was indeed encouraging to find a large measure of time and money being devoted to improving the agricultural situation. Approximately 28 percent of counterpart funds have been devoted to agriculture in Italy. This sum is considerably higher than the percentage devoted to such programs in other countries.

A very comprehensive reclamation and irrigation program is now under way in northern and southern Italy. Approximately 1,500,000 acres were programed for irrigation. Many thousands of acres of land now unproductive are included in projects under way for development. The goal of the reclamation and irrigation program is to provide employment for approximately 500,000 people. However, this is only about one-fourth of the present unemployment in the south of Italy. Under the best of conditions, Italy will be confronted with an ever-growing problem of unemployment due to excessive population and limited land area.

As a result of the ECA programs, considerable progress has been made in stemming communism in Italy. However, with the low standards of living and the pressure of unemployment, there is an ever-present threat from the Communists that could rapidly undo the good that has been achieved in this country without the continued economic and political support of the United States.

There is a striking absence of thriving small business in most of Europe. This is also true in Italy. Our conception of a thriving economic life anticipates much active small business. In order to stimulate the growth of this small business, Italy is confronted with the problem, as are most other countries of Europe, of capital for development. Long-term credit in Italy is something that is practically unknown and interest rates in their present system of banking run as high as 18 percent for short-term loans. Such an atmosphere for capital investment prevents any measurable expansion, Although it is recognized that credit limitations are necessary to prevent inflationary trends, it does not appear that much economic expansion can be achieved until there is ample credit available for business, both large and small. The internal financial situation in Italy appears quite encouraging. The Government financial deficit is small and has been successively reduced each year so that, comparatively speaking, faith in the money of the country is very good in Italy. It is recognized that this internal soundness of the Italian lira was achieved only at a terrific cost to the Italian people in high prices for scarce goods, but it is a situation that all of the countries of Europe must face and solve by tightening their belts.

Because of ECA aid in providing the necessary raw materials, Italy was able, as a result of expanding her export business, to build up many credits in the participating countries as well as the other European countries. This vigorous pushing of exports resulted in a rather high industrial activity which it is doubtful can be maintained when consumer demand has been satisfied. However, the fact remains that, as of the present, Italy has become a considerable creditor to most of Europe and is unable to receive payment except in the soft currencies. This fact accounts for the Italian dissatisfaction with the trade and payment plan of ECA which Italy contends penalizes her because of her excellent record in industrial production and export trade.

Italy presents a most acute problem from the standpoint of the future when American aid is stopped. Unless many problems still necessary of solution are resolved prior to 1952, it does not appear that this country can maintain political stability long after aid stops because her present political stability is dependent upon economic progress directly attributable to American aid.

Before returning to Paris, I visited Naples and studied the southern section of Italy, which is the poorer section of the country and offers the biggest problem from the standpoint of agricultural reclamation and recovery.

I proceeded to Paris from Rome, visiting en route the principal port of Italy, Genoa, as well as other ports on the Mediterranean. My return trip to Paris was across the breadth of France, where I surveyed industrial reconstruction as well as numerous public-works projects which were either progressing with direct ECA assistance or indirect assistance by use of counterpart funds allocated for public projects.

After returning to Paris, I attended conferences with Mr. Hoffman, Mr. Schumann, Sir Stafford Cripps, of Great Britain, and other officials of the OEEC who were meeting in Paris in the latter part of October, discussing the problems of future programs of ECA assistance. It was at these meetings that Mr. Hoffman expressed his determination for more progress toward European integration.

United Kingdom

After a trip to Spain, I returned to Paris, and from there visited England, arriving in London on the 9th of November. In London, I conferred with our ECA mission chief, Mr. John Kenney, with our Ambassador, Mr. Lewis Douglas, and held discussions with the staff members of the Embassy and the ECA special mission.

On November 12, I attended an Embassy briefing concerned chiefly with the military assistance program, at which members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, Congressman JOSEPH L. PFEIFER, of New York, and Congressman THOMAS S. GORDON, of Illinois, were present.

I conferred with Sir Stafford Cripps, Chancelor of the Exchequer; Mr. A. Bevan, Minister of Health; Mr. George Russell Strauss, Minister of Supply; Mr. Douglas Jay, Economic Secretary to the Secretary; Mr. Hugh Gaitskell, Minister of Fuel and Power; and Mr. John Strachey, Minister of Food.

I also conferred with Vincent Tewson, general secretary of the Trade-Unions Council, and Mr. Harold Wilson, president of the Board of Trade.

During an industrial tour of some of the plants in the United Kingdom, I conferred with Sir Montague Hughman, chairman of the Henley Tyre & Rubber Co. and the Henley Telegraph Co., and with Sir Edward Crowe, a director of this organization, and with other members of the organization.

I also visited the Morgan Crucible Co. and discussed the industrial situation in the United Kingdom with Mr. P. Lindsay, chairman of the board of this organization, and with a number of his directors.

I traveled from London to Dublin, and on the way I had the opportunity of observing first-hand the situation in the industrial heart of the United Kingdom and ascertained the economic situation in Ireland. In Dublin, I conferred with Prime Minister J. A. Costello; Sean McBride, Foreign Minister; Mr. J. E. Carrigan, Chief of the ECA Mission; Mr. George A. Garrett, our Ambassador, and various members of the Irish Government.

I returned to London where additional study and conferences were held with the ECA Mission staff. I left London on December 2 en route to Washington.

The complexities of the economic situation in the United Kingdom make a determination of the progress of recovery in this nation extremely difficult to ascertain. Certainly employment is high; business activity is vigorous; exports are far in excess of prewar, and imports have decreased. Ordinarily, such a situation would indicate a sound economic position. However, the impact of war on Great Britain's economic situation is probably greater than on any other participating country. Unquestionably, the United Kingdom is the key nation of western Europe. Her power and influence in any recovery of Europe is a powerful influence. Her position as banker to the sterling area increases the liabilities attendant upon her recovery. Her experiments in socialism add to the complex determination of her recovery.

As pointed out above, her exports are extremely high. The value of her commodity trade in exports for the third quarter of 1949, measured in prewar prices, stands at approximately 140 percent of prewar. Her imports for the same quarter stand at approximately 91 percent, reflecting a very favorable trade balance and an excellent record of increased production. The difficulty with this position is that the greater portion of these exports are to soft-currency countries or to the sterling area, whereas her position from the standpoint of exports to dollar areas is not nearly so favorable.

The Government is committed to a policy of full employment. This policy must be maintained regardless of the party in power. Mr. John Strachey, Minister of Food, reports that the population of the United Kingdom is eating better than at any time in recent history. This statement does not mean that everyone is, but it means that more people are able to obtain more food than in the past although many who, in the past, were able to afford many luxuries, cannot do so under the present situation. This, of course, is a result of the rationing and food-control programs. The diet, as a whole, is extremely monotonous but is certainly sufficient and wholesome.

The extent to which devaluation may add to the solution of the United Kingdom's economic problems cannot be judged at this time. It appears to be a step in the right direction. Devaluation in itself cannot solve the dollar shortage. Statistics reflect a considerable increase in exports even to dollar areas volumewise since devaluation. It is questionable whether or not a sufficient increase in volume can be attained to overcome the loss in dollars resulting from the devaluation. If such is to be achieved, it must necessarily result from more efficient production. Great emphasis is being placed upon more and more efficient production, both by management and by labor. However, considering the fact that volume of production has increased approximately 50 percent over prewar with the labor force entirely employed, it is questionable how much efficiency can be increased. Inasmuch as the present social experiments require an extremely high rate of taxation, much of the incentive for more efficient production is lost.

My observations in several industrial plants indicate an average take-home pay for the industrial worker of approximately $18 to $22 per week. This, compared to the average industrial take-home pay of the American worker, appears to be an extremely low wage. However, comparisons as such must be related to the purchase value of the take-home pay. It is in this field that the Socialist Government provides the cushion for an apparent low-wage standard. By rationing and subsidies on food and clothing the Government is able to maintain a fair standard of living at these wage rates. By providing such services, however, the cost of government is so great that the incentive to the worker to work longer hours even at higher rates is lost because any earnings in excess of his present average must be taxed at such rates as to make the added effort unappealing. Yet the revenue is necessary in order to maintain the present social experiments.

Much of the increased production is sold in sterling markets. Such markets are, of course, protected markets, and competition does not play the part in controlling costs that it should. The result, naturally, tends to make the industrialists more complacent and less interested in lower-cost production. However, such markets do not increase the dollar earning capacity of the United Kingdom, and therefore do not provide the means with which to import many of the raw materials necessary from dollar areas in support of the production level.

A most disturbing problem to the United Kingdom is that of unrequited exports. During the war the Government incurred enormous debts in sterling areas which much of the current production is being used to pay off. Such portions of these debts as the Government may allow to be converted into dollars results in a drain on her current dollar earnings or out of her gold and dollar reserves, which have been diminishing steadily since before the war and at an accelerated rate during and since the war. Her dollar earnings have been in a similar declining position.

Many of her assets held in dollar areas were liquidated during the war and her current income from invisibles such as travel, insurance, shipping, and so on cannot provide the dollars to finance the deficit between her exports and imports in dollar areas. Until the beginning of the third quarter of 1949, her internal revenue was sufficient to meet her expenditures and provide small amounts for debt reduction. At about this time, her revenue began to fail to meet her expenditures and steps were being taken by the ECA mission to the United Kingdom to stop further withdrawals from the counterpart fund for the purpose of short-term debt reduction. Considerable argument could be made that the United Kingdom's social experiments were not being directly financed by ECA aid so long as her revenue exceeded her expenditures and she was able to maintain her socialistic experiments out of current revenue. Such a position is hardly tenable with respect to the indirect support that ECA aid has upon her social experiments. However, when her expenditures begin to exceed her revenues, it becomes apparent that any contribution from counterpart funds to debt reduction is a direct contribution to her socialization program. Another drain upon her revenues resulted from devaluation. It was necessary for her to deposit with the International Monetary Fund £148,000,000 as additional reserves after devaluation.

This, of course, was a big factor in her present position of an unbalanced budget. However, a greater contribution to this situation is the vast numbers of Government employees necessary to administer her many social schemes. The Government had announced plans of reduction in expenditures, principally from dismissal of Government workers. It is extremely doubtful if she can pursue such a course far enough to return to a balance of income and expenditures.

Certainly, if the objectives desired by the United States in securing a free and economically sound western Europe are to succeed, the United Kingdom must be an important consideration in these goals. It does not appear at present that with all of her marvelous record for recovery, production, and trade, the United Kingdom could long survive the withdrawal of United States assistance. This does not mean that there is any present or future danger of the United Kingdom going communistic. It does indicate that she cannot maintain her economic position in western Europe without continued United States aid.

CONCLUSION

European recovery, measured by all standards, has been more successful than even the most optimistic had hoped for. The economic soundness of this recovery is still open to considerable doubt. This observation is made because of the fact that in several of the more important countries no one maintains that the present economic level of activity could long be maintained if United States aid were withdrawn. In considering the result of the withdrawal of United States aid, our objectives in beginning aid must be reviewed. The governments of several of the countries can maintain a stable position only so long as the economic activities within those countries continue and do not deteriorate appreciably. Although our intention in aiding Europe may have been considerably altruistic, nevertheless more definite objectives must be in mind and such objectives must be the interest and security of the United States. If the self-interest and security of the United States is the more important objective, then it is inevitable that we must maintain the stability of our political allies in the ever-continuing struggle to wipe out communism.

As heretofore indicated, success in this objective has been immeasurable. However, it has not been complete, and it does not appear that it will be complete in 1952.

The staff of the joint committee presented suggestions for reductions in the amount of aid for Europe in the present fiscal year. The suggested reduction was approximately 25 percent below budget estimates. From my study of the situation in the fall of 1949, I found nothing to indicate that European recovery would have been materially retarded if Congress had appropriated the smaller sum recommended by the committee. Admittedly, the standard of living of the majority of the people may not have been as high as the present. However, it is highly significant that the present standard cannot be maintained without considerable United States aid even after 1952. This situation presents the danger of the necessity of withdrawing all aid at one time and causing too rapid a reduction in these present standards which could, of course, undo most of the good that we have done. Recognizing the probable impossibility of achieving completely the desired results of economic stability by the end of the program in 1952, it is my observation that the aid that we intend to furnish in the future should be reduced considerably this year and by an even greater amount the following year so that the termination of aid in 1952 will not cause too great a shock to the economic activity heretofore induced principally by United States aid.

PAT MCCARRAN,
Chairman, Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation.

KNOWLEDGE OF THE MARSHALL PLAN IN EUROPE

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, in President Truman's Seventh Report to Congress of the Economic Cooperation Administration, some 11 pages are devoted to a chapter entitled "Informing the People of Europe About ERP." Included in this chapter are such astonishing statements as "more than four out of five Europeans are aware of the Marshall plan," and "on still more detailed questions about the nature of counterpart funds, an average of about 35 percent offered the correct answers."

Mr. President, I hope that these statements, which are supposedly based on public-opinion surveys in some of the Marshall-plan countries, are true. I, myself, found it extremely difficult, and I now find it difficult, to believe that one out of three Europeans can answer dedetailed questions about the nature of counterpart funds. In any event, I firmly believe that we should not allow ourselves to be lulled into a false sense of security by a few public-opinion polls.

In this connection, I should like to invite the attention of the Members of the Senate to a report on this very vital subject by the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation, of which I have the honor to be chairman. This report was made last fall, and chiefly concerns itself with the problems of public information in France. However, I believe that its general observations and conclusions still obtain, and most important, that it points up the necessity for constant and vigilant effort on our part in establishing real communication with the peoples of western Europe.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this report, entitled "Knowledge of the Marshall Plan in Europe: France," by the "watchdog committee" on ECA, be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KNOWLEDGE OF THE MARSHALL PLAN IN EUROPE: FRANCE

INTRODUCTION

This report concerns the Marshall plan information program in France. It is based upon a 6 weeks' on-the-spot study by two staff members of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation.

The report indicates that pro-Marshall plan forces in France are not doing as effective a job of telling about it as are anti-Marshall plan forces, specifically, French Communists. Some of the difficulties in getting across the western story to the French people are analyzed, and remedial lines of action are suggested.

There are compelling reasons for telling about Marshall plan aid as well as giving it: The highly successful French Communist campaign against it; the deep-grained native suspicion of all foreign nations; the belief that people will be encouraged to stand fast with us in our determination to maintain peace and freedom if they know the real reasons for the Marshall plan.

The first draft of this report was reviewed by ECA Administrator Paul G. Hoffman, who commented:

"The report concerning knowledge of the Marshall plan in France is a well-written appraisal of our informational problems. It outlines the basic difficulties inherent in the program. For the most part, we concur in the statements but there are instances where we would disagree."

Other comments by the Administrator on specific points will be found in appropriate places in the report.

THE COMMUNIST CAMPAIGN TO DEFEAT THE MARSHALL PLAN

Since the formation of the Communist Information Bureau (Cominform) in October 1947, Communists everywhere have waged ceaseless verbal and, in some cases, economic warfare against the Marshall plan. They have sought to create suspicion of it, or outright hostility to it.

In no country has the party been more vigorous in this effort than in France. These efforts have met with a large measure of success. A study of the nature and extent of the Communist-propaganda activities is essential to an understanding of the information problems there.

Administrator Hoffman stressed this point:

"The considerable part of the report dealing with Communist activities and opposition is in accord with our views based on a year's experience with the problems. It would be difficult to overestimate the significance of this part of our work, especially in the labor field."

Number of Communists

There is no verifiable figure for Communist Party membership. The prewar total was 100,000, which rose, according to party claims, to 1,000,000 by 1946. Membership has since fallen off. The informed consensus now sets the figure of the "hard core" at approximately 700,000 members.

The figure for Communists and fellow travelers of various political shadings who would vote the Communist ticket on a Nation-wide basis is variously estimated at between 20 and 25 percent of the voting population.

Lines of authority

The direction of the Communist network in France rests in four organizations:

(1) The secretariat, headed by Maurice Thorez, Jacques Duclos, Andre Marty, and Leon Mauvais, is the highest ranking unit in the French Communist pyramid, directly under the control of the Cominform and of the Soviet Embassy in Paris.

(2) The congress, which meets annually, and which does little more than ratify the decisions of the secretariat and Cominform,

(3) The central committee, composed of 38 members and 33 stand-ins elected by the congress on nomination of the politicial bureau.

(4) The political bureau made up of nine members and four stand-ins, chosen in reality by itself (members reelect themselves or name successors).

Communist financing

The funds available to France's Communist network are enormous. Non-Communist elements agree on the enormity, but are at variance on the amount because the party has been adroit in masking its budgetary affairs. It is worth examining their financing in order to understand the size of the fund which is committed to sabotaging the Marshall plan and to selling France on another system.

The figure most often quoted by authorities ranges between five and ten billion francs annually, and is based on an evaluation of (a) production costs of the party's total publishing operation, (b) salary costs of permanent party employees, and (c) the funds entrusted to important individual members of the party.

All studies of Communist financing segregate the revenues originating in France from those contributed by the U. S. S. R. and satellites. All agree that funds of French origin are nowhere near enough to finance the vast machine.

There are several lines of supply. Domestically, funds are collected from (a) rank-and-file contributions, (b) subscriptions to Communist press, (c) levies against party members holding public office. Voluntary contributions from the nongovernment rank and file total several hundred million and revenues from subscriptions several million. A rich source of domestic revenue is the raid on the French treasury by party officeholders.

During the postliberation period of Communist participation in the Government, the party managed to install a substantial number of followers in key positions within the nationalized industries. The appointments came in numbers following the success of the party in placing a Communist, Marcel Paul, as France's Minister of Industrial Production. Communists still have a large measure of administrative control in public utilities—gas and electricity—still retain controlling nuclei in railroads, the university, and even the police forces.

Successive governments have been waging a partially successful 3-year fight to dislodge these key Communist figures from their positions within the nationalized industries, but in some they are still strong. Through a series of complicated maneuvers they are able to divert social-security funds, in whose collection and payment workers have a voice, toward payment of salaries of permanent party employees. The net effect is a levy on the anti-Communist French Government to finance the Communist Party.

Incidentally the last coal strike called by the party was connected to a degree with this raid on the treasury. Last fall the Government attempted a closer supervision of social-security funds, a move which was immediately twisted by the Communists into a perversion of fact justifying the strike. The main purpose was to hamstring the nation's economy and thus sabotage the Marshall plan, but a strong factor was the desire to confuse any Government effort to stop the raid.

Expropriations no longer figure as a source of revenue in France, but they merit inclusion as a source of money which permitted French Communists to finance their great surge immediately after the liberation in 1944. Stepping into the confusion the party expropriated a vast amount of money and property from collaborationists and German sympathizers and then without reference to political distinctions expropriated hundreds of millions more from banks and private individuals. The total expropriated built the war chest which financed the Communist drive of 1945.

But the total of all funds raised domestically is far from enough to finance the Communist structure as it operates in France. A large, undetermined amount is forwarded through diplomatic pouch from the U. S. S. R. and from Russian satellites. There are many incidents attesting to the arrival of moneys, such as the sale of gold bars on the Paris market by agents of the party. But the only essential index of the amount spent by the party is its activity, which is vast, costly, and smooth.

Communist and allied organizations

It is in the field of clubs, associations, societies, etc., that the Communists have shown the measure of their talent for infiltration. They have constructed a tight grid of organizations all over France, a network that is the more effective because none of the organizations bear the label "Communist." The camouflage is systematic. Communist women are grouped into an association called the Union of French Women (l'Union des Femmes Françaises); Communist Youth Into the Union of Republican Youth in France (l'Union de la Jeunesse Republicaine de France). Great numbers of unsuspecting people join these organizations without knowing they are Communist.

Everywhere the Communists have organized clubhouses: Foyers for people with a grievance; foyers for former political refugees, for veterans, for the victims of bombing; amicales or local and business clubs for deportees, internees, resistance groups; and the F. F. I. and related groups.

Typical, because of its effectiveness, is the Compagnons de la Liberté (Friends of Liberty), an organization of former resistance men which was reconstituted in 1948. It camouflages orders from the party and executes them under the guise of a fraternal organization dedicated to perpetuating the memory of France's struggle with the Germans.

Communists dominate the local committees of the Liberation many of which still exist; organizations of tenants as opposed to landlords; family associations; organizations of war widows; defense committees of craft groups, and associations of small-business men. They are active in sports organizations, bowling associations, even in fishermen's clubs. They have their management headquarters, special garages for their vehicles, their gas stations. They dominate many cooperatives and workers' canteens. They have purchasing commissions everywhere. They have infiltrated radio.

All of these organizations are outlets for the incessant attack on the Marshall plan.

Publishing outlets

The Communist Party has always placed great stress on written propaganda, but its postwar drive in France has set new standards. It is running in France what is one of the greatest publishing operations ever performed by a political force in any country at any time. It has at its disposal today an enormous variety of outlets gained from an opportune drive during the confusion of the liberation to take over control of printing houses and newspapers in every department of France. In Paris alone it controls six publishing houses. Aside from the establishments owned outright it has other servile publishing facilities provided by commercial groups who still think it advisable to hedge against the possibility of a Communist government coming to power.

The party publishes 40 newspapers and reviews just in Paris. This does not take into account a separate list of neighborhood newspapers, industry and house organs, the publications of its own clubs and associations and of those which it influences indirectly.

There is not a single department of France without a Communist newspaper. Where the area is too small to justify a daily the party builds a weekly. They multiplied just after the liberation, but since then have lost some ground numerically. Nevertheless, their influence is still powerful, in large part because of the failure of many moderate newspapers.

The most powerful Communist organ in France is L'Humanité of Paris, a morning daily with a circulation of 260,000, and an influence that is country-wide. Throughout France its daily policy output is channeled through distribution committees organized in behalf of L'Humanité in all provinces and departments where the party has a cell or section.

L'Humanité's evening counterpart is named Ce Soir (circulation 250,000), which represents itself as a straight news sheet rather than a political organ.

Another powerful organ covering the morning field is Liberation, which, under the mask of news, presents Communist policy for the fellow travelers and certain elements of the resistance. Its staff is heavily populated with Communists and fellow travelers.

The party publishes several weeklies, some of the strongest being—

Action.

France d'Abord, organ of the Communist resistance oganization, F. T. P.

France Nouvelle, a bulletin directed at party workers.

L'Humanité Dimanche.

Les Lettres Francaises.

La Terre, directed toward the farm population.

La Vie Ouvrière, Le Peuple, directed toward the labor unions.

Also biweekly reviews, monthlies, and quarterlies, among the most influential being—

Cashiers du Communisme.

Democratie Nouvelle.

L'Écran Francais.

Études Sovietiques.

Europe.

France-U. S. S. R.

La Nouvelle Critique.

La Pensée.

Servir la France.

But the Communist output cannot be measured solely in terms of the speed and volume of its printing presses and mimeograph machines. It must also be acknowledged that the quality of the publications is generally high. That is, they get their message across by tailoring it for specific audiences. Labor is a case in point.

The French metallurgical worker, for example, is given a Communist newspaper which is a metallurgical trade paper, speaking his own professional language, treating of his own pet professional problems, backing and defending his every grievance, his own peculiar wage-and-hour interests, his insurance situation, his bargaining position, all the things which are immediate to him as contrasted to the specific grievances of a maritime worker. The maritime worker has his own Communist trade paper, geared with the same fidelity to his own set of worries, interests, and ambitions. And so it goes for the full roster of trades and professions.

Communist doctrine in its approach to France's workers is warm and friendly. For some years Communist doctrine (the vast outpouring of information through every type of media) has minimized or discarded the word "citizen." Instead the Communists have substituted the word "laborer" in their millions of columns of type, their literature, brochures, posters, radio broadcasts, speeches, conferences, and congresses. There is a new being, "the laborer." In a discussion of a proposed Government measure, say a budgetary reform, the Communist line is clear, vicious, and specific—how does it exploit labor? In their exhortations, an economic measure before the French Assembly is never evaluated in terms of the balanced interests of the businessman, the employer, the large property holder and the small one, but only in one line, that of the worker, as though, numerically, there were no other component in the French economy.

The worker naturally has reacted to the tribute. Not for him the anonymity of being a man among other men. He has been shown an image, a sculptured symbol of a man of sinew, strength, work, sweat, and accomplishment, a highly ennobled conception of labor versus the world, certainly versus the rest of France. That is the incessant theme. Not all French labor has bought it, but a large number has.

Communist role in labor

But though the Communists have put on this show of solicitude for the welfare of the worker they really regard labor as front-line troops in the struggle with the west. They have used labor to attempt to sabotage economic recovery and thus the Marshall plan, as witness last fall's coal-mine strikes. Most important, they see the workers of France as key weapons in the event of open conflict with the west. Last winter Maurice Thorez, French Communist leader, made it clear that in any war between France and Russia his party would be on the side of Moscow. Obviously, if M. Thorez can command the allegiance of only a few hundred thousand workers, strategically positioned in vital industries, he could effect a sabotage campaign of proportions sufficient to cripple France's military potential.

M. Thorez and his party at present dominate the largest labor union in France, the Confédération Général du Travail (CGT). It is made up of more than 30 separate national labor unions. It is especially strong in such essential industries as mining, building construction, metallurgy, and railroads. The CGT claims over 4,000,000 members, but according to most sources its actual strength is about 2,000,000. Not all the members, of course, are Communist, but they have not thus far obstructed Communist leadership.

Communists and fellow travelers exercise control by occupying the top positions in the CGT and in the member national federations. They have been in and out of the organization since 1919. In 1921 they were ousted because of ideological differences with the Socialists. They were readmitted to the fold in 1936 at the time of the Popular Front, but were expelled again in January 1940 because they supported the Nazi-Soviet pact. After Hitler attacked Russia in June 1941 they again united with non-Communists, and their subsequent aggressive and effective role in the resistance movement won them scores of thousands of converts. Capitalizing on their resistance record, they gained control of the CGT immediately after the liberation and retain it to this writing.

The non-Communist role in labor

Veteran observers in France agree that the ranks of the CGT can be contained, and perhaps eventually decimated, only by anti-Communist organized labor groups. Unfortunately such groups have so far proved to be rather ineffectual instruments of opposition.

The two largest anti-Communists labor unions are the Confédération Général du Travail, Force Ouvrière (CGT-FO) and the Confederation Francaise des Travailleurs Chrétiens (CFTC). Each organization has about 1,000,000 adherents, but a somewhat smaller number of dues payers.

Force Ouvrière was formed in December 1947 following a split in CGT ranks over the general strikes which had been called the previous months. The dissidents who formed the Force Ouvrière charge that the Communists were exploiting the just grievances of labor in order to create economic chaos. In splitting off from the CGT, Force Ouvrière was forced to abandon all the assets its members had helped to build up—offices, office equipment, automobiles, and funds in the CGT treasury. It began its existence with little money, and lack of finances has been its greatest single handicap ever since. For example, in one coal mining region in the north of France, the Communist CGT has 30 paid, full-time organizers and 20 automobiles. In the same region FO has only three organizers and the part-time use of one automobile. Under such circumstances, it is practically impossible for FO to make any headway in that area.

As a result of its lack of money, FO has had to fight its labor battles with the aid of few of the weapons that should be in the arsenal of the non-Communist unions—newspapers, brochures, pamphlets, posters, movies, radio, handbills, etc. Its main information weapon is a weekly paper, Force Ouvrière, a poor publication by journalistic standards, which has a circulation of only 60,000. Upshot is that even when FO makes a favorable reference to Marshall plan objectives, it reaches a pitifully small audience.

Ironically, and some say inexcusably, FO is embarrassed, if not occasionally handicapped, by the fact that it has openly supported the Marshall plan. Its embarrassment arises not only from the fact that the Communists promptly gave it the label "American hired hands," but from the failure of the French Government to take labor into its confidence concerning the plans for and operation of the Marshall plan. Not knowing the technical story of Marshall plan aid as actually utilized in France, FO leaders often find it difficult or impossible to reply to specific Communist lies.

(In this connection it is interesting to note that, from the beginning, the United States and many of the participating nations have given labor representatives a role in the formulation of Marshall plan policy and in its administration.)

The Catholic trade-union, CFTC, has the most dependable membership of any of the large unions, that is, it does not suffer the extreme fluctuations in membership that are characteristic of other unions. It is strongest among white-collar workers and women in the textile industry. In keeping with traditional Catholic trade-union policy, it is not a militant organization, and observers say this has mitigated against its efforts to gain adherents from the large number of unorganized workers.

Actually, unorganized labor outnumbers organized labor in French industry. Before last fall's coal strikes trade-union members totaled about five and one-half million, or approximately 40 percent of the total industrial labor force. It is generally acknowledged, except by the Communists, that the disastrous coal strikes resulted in a substantial reduction in CGT membership, and it is estimated that today over 60 percent of the industrial labor force is not organized.

Therefore, the balance of power in labor rests potentially with those who are not members of unions. Because they are always potential members, they are the objects of flattering courtship by organized labor. In the contest for their affections, the CGT, with its unlimited resources and thousands of zealots, must be given the edge. The best anti-Communist hope lies in the Force Ouvrière and the CFTC. But hope, and mere encouragement and advice from United States labor representatives in France, will not make them effective. What they really need is organization, which in turn means facilities and financing. There is little prospect that they will obtain either under present circumstances.

The Communist line of attack on the Marshall plan

Dating from the formation of the Cominform, Red arguments must be conceded a high level of success in molding the French conception of the plan. If the output were confined to Communists, the result, while serious, would not be too damaging. But the Communist line is not so confined. The anti-American arguments are repeated innocently and inadvertently by vast numbers who are not remotely Communists: by labor, industrialists, peasants, and white-collar workers. They have become the common stock of French conversation.

The Cominform's absurdities are accepted as fact by educated people who should know better. They are picked up by the non-Communist press and repeated by non-Communist deputies in Parliament. The Communist arguments have permeated France, have slowed down acceptance of the idea of the Marshall plan.

The Communist themes fall into two categories—(a) the basic, constantly repeated arguments which vary little from month to month—the so-called permanent line; and (b) the day-by-day improvisations attacking specific developments in the program.

The basic line: Basic line No. 1—American industry desperate: The whole United States business structure is due to collapse. America must keep up a production volume equal to its wartime levels or fall apart. It cannot consume goods in such volume, therefore, has made a desperate decision to colonize Europe to force it to buy United States surpluses.

This theme has numberless variations, all of them a clarion call to Europe to defend itself against the American bid for empire. Some of the variations are—

The United States seeks to enslave European labor.

The United States has installed American staffs which actually run each country.

The Marshall plan means unemployment.

The Marshall plan means the looting of Europe's natural resources.

The Marshall plan means outright United States control of certain European industries.

The Marshall plan will rebuild Germany into a dominant and belligerent power (in Germany the line is that the plan means permanent debilitation of Germany).

Basic line No. 2—The Marshall plan is a war plan. The Marshall plan is a conspiracy to buy military allies in Europe, a plan to build Europe's war potential for the planned war by backing the operation with as much money as necessary but with as little American blood as possible.

Specific attacks: This subject can be covered with the blanket statement that virtually every one of the daily policy decisions of ECA or OEEC is met by a Communist counterblast. Every time the Marshall plan acts, the Communist press speaks.

Thus, to a statistical release giving the quarterly total of United States authorizations to France, the reply is:

"America's vaunted sacrifice for European recovery is less than the cost of its cigarette bill."

When the aluminum flurry occurred between the United States and Britain, the Communists had a field day:

"Behold capitalism and capitalists. Behold the titans of industry with no honor, ethics, or honesty, even when one (America) is allegedly bailing out another in order to preserve the solidarity of international capitalism. Even here these ruthless, instinctively competitive capitalists try to cheat each other. No, my friends, only in the Communist faith is there true brotherhood, true selflessness, true identity of interests between the peoples of one country, etc."

When the French Government came forth with a proposal to tighten France's tax situation, the quotation from the Red press was:

"The Marshall-plan gauleiters yesterday cracked the whip and the Government quislings went through their paces. Our "leaders" have surrendered the sovereignty of France to the carpetbaggers from Wall Street."

On the question of east-west trade the line is:

"American expansionists have found a new trick to prevent trade between east and west. The "marshallized" countries are forbidden to send goods to eastern Europe on the flimsy ground that it might increase the military potential of the Soviet Union. This policy has dealt a severe blow to France, which has thus lost its historic eastern European markets."

Of course the Communist line is far from gospel in France. It is not always repeated verbatim. But it has undeniably created a widespread distrust.

The obvious questions are, Among how many? To what extent?

WHO KNOWS ABOUT THE MARSHALL PLAN IN FRANCE?

Every newspaperman with whom the subject was discussed (the list includes Paris correspondents of British, Italian, Danish, Swedish, German, French, and American newspapers) warned that it is clouded by dangerous generalities. Taking into account the difficulty of estimating the degree of knowledge of 41,000,000 people, there is a consensus view. A representative summary was given by the Paris bureau chief of a press association. After making his own survey of French knowledge of the Marshall plan, he made the following analysis:

"Since polls are out of fashion, we must make judgment estimates. My own is that 90 percent of the population of France hasn't the vaguest inkling of the technical provisions of the Marshall plan—such things as that it is a plan; that it involves a counterpart fund; that it is jointly administered by Europeans as well as Americans; that it means recovery and not relief; that the plan has specific time objectives in each of many economic fields. There is an awareness that it exists, thanks to the Communist press, by most of the people of France, but it is a vague, hearsay thing. Most of the people of France have heard about it and most of them distrust it without knowing exactly what it was. They are looking for the gimmick—every one of them. Not all of them believe that the United States is out to colonize the world, but no one is willing to buy it at America's own appraisal—as an idea that may straighten out Europe. French skepticism is worlds apart from American optimism. If this thing is going to work, it will be because of America's great capacity for patience."

A parliamentary deputy and leader of one of the largest non-Communist parties in France put it this way:

"A mass of people, certainly 60 percent, has heard about the Marshall plan and has a scrambled, vague knowledge that it involves American gifts which must be viewed with great suspicion."

"If there is one categorical statement to be made on this subject it is that not 1 Frenchman in 500 believes that there is any element of good faith involved in this thing. They're sure that America is motivated only by its own economic needs. It is inadmissible that a nation—any nation—should dip into its pockets to help another without an overriding self-interest. What that self-interest is is a different thing to each Frenchman, depending upon his exposure, direct or indirect, to the Communist ouput.

"Another point: Despite the admirable effort of ECA to explain the objectives—the basic ideas of the Marshall plan—the Frenchman's awareness of it stems from Red publicity. Volumewise, it is all one-sided.

"Incidentally, I do not believe that there are 20 deputies among my colleagues in the Chamber who have a knowledge of the principal provisions of the Marshall plan. From the standpoint of its successes this may be a good thing."

There is little question that much of what is known in France about the Marshall plan stems directly or indirectly from the Communist output. On the other hand, the United States has waged its campaign largely with goods and money, hoping that somehow or other the French will understand what the United States is trying to do, will understand that the Marshall plan may be the one great chance for Europe to pull out of its difficulties.

On one side of the Atlantic the Congress has no illusions about building up foreign markets or developing European customers. It has understood that European recovery is the end to be achieved and voted funds on that basis. On the other side of the ocean, much of an entire nation remains in ignorance of the objectives of the plan designed to assist the participating countries, and is either apathetic or hostile. The Communists are bombarding France with an incessant attack telling her to wake up and reject United States imperialism.

The west has not adequately explained the Marshall plan, and has not reached the minds of that section of French labor which is organized, nor the millions who are unorganized. We are relying upon cotton, wheat, coal, petroleum, machinery, and a blueprint, on the theory that if the plan succeeds prosperity will defy communism. But the average French citizen does not know much about this Marshall plan wheat, coal, and blueprint, and knows nothing about counterpart, and nothing about those over-all objectives of the Marshall plan, such as the elimination of trade barriers, the mechanization of agriculture, the need to produce and to export, the need to firm up budgets and stabilize money, much less does he realize that their achievement will better his chances for independence. These are the tenets of the Marshall plan, but much French knowledge of it stops with the title and a jumbled mass of suspicions, Communist-inspired, that America is up to something.

No one has succeeded in explaining the opposite story on a country-wide scale, the real story what the Marshall plan is, and why the overloaded citizens of America are digging up tax money to finance it.

Why it has not been done, and what the difficulties are in doing it, are the substance of the remainder of this report.

"We would not dispute the fact that a great number of people do not understand the details of the Marshall plan, but we know that considerable progress is being made. The informational program has been stepped up and the results should become evident in increasing degree."

DIFFICULTIES BLOCKING INFORMATION ON THE PLAN

French inaction

In France the Marshall plan is being publicized by the biggest, one of the richest and most effective publicity organizations in the world.

The amount of publicity which the Communist Party has put out dissecting the Marshall plan is staggering. It has managed to get its message into the press in hamlets and villages in metropolitan centers and farm areas. It has turned out tons of pamphlets, brochures, and posters, and has seen to it that they are pasted up by the thousands, that they are handed to workers as they enter or leave the factory. It has not missed a bet with any segment of the population.

The French administrators of the Marshall plan have not begun to match the effort of explaining it.

Back of this lassitude and inaction is a powerful set of reasons. They are justifiable as an explanation of the enormous difficulty in getting the message through to France. They are less justifiable if the result be described bluntly as a default to the Communists. Whether justifiable or not, they must be appraised.

The war psychosis: One cause of French inaction in publicizing the plan, a retarding force as effective with the Government as with the press is the fear of war between Russia and the west.

In France it is hard to talk Marshall plan with an editor or Government man and to keep the discussion channeled to the subject. Somewhere in the discussion the Frenchman will raise the question of war, that it is possible, if not probable, that in event of war nothing can stop a Russian sweep from the Elbe to the Atlantic and that once again France will be occupied by a foreign power. The thought pervades France. It is a force in slowing investments, putting a drag on construction, causing a slow-down in undertaking certain projects which otherwise would be under way. This war psychosis can be described. Its effects cannot be measured quantitatively. Editors, businessmen, members of Parliament agreed emphatically that while it is an intangible, it is a real and positive brake on the economic drive postulated in the plan.

This war factor was summarized with amazing candor by the publisher of one of the largest newspaper syndicates in France.

"France—

He stated—

"could under certain circumstances achieve a magnificent recovery without the Marshall plan. If somehow the threat of war, more specifically, occupation, could be obliterated from the French mind, France would have its own renaissance. If Frenchmen could be assured that there will not be another war for 25 years, the amount of gold that would come out of hiding and go into circulation and investment would dwarf the annual billion dollars received from you Americans; since there is no force on earth which can give that guaranty or assurance, the gold will remain in hiding. As a Frenchman I dislike making this explanation of the hoarded gold of French citizens. It represents their last concrete hedge against occupation by an enemy power. That gold will not emerge."

In the light of this war fear, all plans, projects, and blueprints are viewed as grave hazards by this war-weary generation. It is not easy for Frenchmen to undertake investments which could eventually be expropriated, to accept without reservation the many projects involved in the Marshall plan, or even to listen too enthusiastically to an explanation of its intricacies.

French sensitivity, resistance, truculence: French sensitivity—France's fierce pride—is one of the elements slowing down the operation of the Marshall plan. To be told that the bread they eat contains free flour, their rails made of donated steel, their currency backed by donated money, is galling. The suggestion that French should be grateful arouses an antagonism so fierce as to jeopardize the negotiations necessary to the various projects in the Marshall plan, and ECA in its information programs has wisely avoided any suggestions of United States generosity, donations, or gratitude. ECA emphasis is "we are all in this thing together. Let us work."

ECA's American administrators and publicists have long since learned that the kiss of death for any publicity project is the suggestion from any quarter that the United States is doing it out of a kind heart, or that it is a gift, or that France should be grateful. But the fact remains that ECA aid is free aid, and France bridles at the thought.

This sensitivity has deep roots. France still cringes at the memory of its inept prewar government, the old scandal of disorganization and corruption which resulted in complete unpreparedness against the German assault. The French have debated that sordid chapter for 10 years but still feel a burning shame in the presence of their more successful allies. Again, France carries deep scars from the military debacle, a chapter which it wants to forget and cannot forget.

Reasons mount rather than decline. The humiliation of defeat was worsened by the occupation phase. The French are sensitive about their collaborationists, and finally over the fact that the liberation came at the hands of foreign powers, Allies to be sure—but, except for the role of France's own resistance forces—as military rescue from the outside.

These past events as they relate to the Marshall plan are not farfetched. They have created a French attitude of mind which is almost hysterically opposed to any hint of domination, and a belligerent attitude even toward the best intentioned advice. France has a chip on its shoulder that has no counterpart in, say, Belgium, England, or Italy. In Italy, strangely enough, where the war record was more dismal than that of the French and where collaboration was state policy, there is no such element of belligerent pride to contend with.

The consequences of this attitude, so difficult to visualize in the United States and so real an obstacle in France, are immediate. They have a direct bearing on the rate of progress of the Marshall plan. One result is that the French press, the non-Communist press is lying down. It is not championing the Marshall plan.

The French press is light on the Marshall plan: It is not news that many of the leading newspapers of France can be bought and that their reputation of venality is pretty well founded. As a result any paper adopting a strong position on an issue is invitably charged with a sell-out. In an issue as controversial as the Marshall plan no paper has cared to go all out. The inference that it is serving American masters would be automatic and widespread. Communist opposition papers set the tone with a blast that the paper is serving foreigners—is not French, has sold France's sovereignty. The charge is echoed by the right with the demand that French affairs be decided by Frenchmen. It does not help the circulation of a French paper to become classified as pro-American or to espouse too eagerly any of the projects of the Marshall plan.

The result is that French papers have adopted a tempered, reserved attitude toward the plan. They do give it some space, preferably factual announcements of developments. But in terms of comparison it is probably safe to say that the New York Times has carried more analytical explanation of the plan's objectives than all the non-Communist French press combined.

Apart from the policy danger of being adjudge a stooge, the French editor is also personally reluctant to acknowledge the fact of American aid. In a discussion editors will express sympathy for the plan and academic approval of its objectives. But they politely decline to make a crusade of it or even give it the same space on a basis of news value that the Marshall plan is accorded by American papers.

It should also be borne in mind that many French newspapers are in reality outright political party organs and not newspapers in the American sense. They rate their own political party welfare first and news values incidentally.

At least two other facts should be mentioned in explanation of the cursory treatment of the Marshall plan by the French press. Most of the news about the plan is economic—technical copy on industrial and agricultural production, exports and fiscal matters, etc.—which gives it a low priority as against the sensational.

Also, newsprint in France has been in short supply, and even crime items are crowded out of newspapers simply for lack of space.

As a commentary on French news volume, one of the leaders of a parliamentary bloc, and, incidentally, one of the strong supporters of the plan, stated that he is able to follow its daily developments only by reading the New York Times and the mimeographed news releases, mailed directly to him by the ECA Paris office.

The French Government is mute on the Marshall plan: the French Government, and more particularly the executive branch, is making the minimum effort at publicizing the Marshall-plan objectives consistent with its commitment to do so in its bilateral agreement with the United States. The reasons are analogous with those paralyzing the French press.

There is a wide diffusion of the story, carefully fostered by the Communists, that the Government of France has abdicated its sovereignty, that ECA's mission head in Paris is in effect the country's governor general and that policy, whether on taxes, agriculture, the budget, exports, production, or electrification, is ordered in Washington. Like many legends it has sufficient credence to make Government men chary of the accusation of defaulting to a foreign power. Certain tenets of the plan call for rigid internal measures, hard to popularize in any circumstance, and doubly so if they are interpreted as American orders.

There is no intention of saying here, directly or by implication that the Government is not cooperating in other aspects of the Marshall plan, a subject outside the scope of this report. What is said is that the French Government is doing virtually nothing in the field of explaining it to France.

The coalition has not colesced: Government inaction stems from still another factor, the fact that the present Government is a coalition incorporating a wide range of violently conflicting economic groups. As a general proposition it is unquestionable that the coalition Government has endorsed the Marshall plan. That is, no party within the majority has asked that it be rejected. But even the groups most favorably disposed toward Marshall-plan measures are hesitant about too strong an advocacy of its requirements for fear of scathing charges that they are obeying foreign masters.

Administrator Hoffman's comments on the above sections are as follows:

"Among difficulties blocking information on the plan, the report lists French pride as one of the major factors. It points to the reluctance on the part of public figures to become too 'pro' anything not of French origin. Under the circumstances this is not unnatural, and the more one studies the circumstances the clearer this becomes.

"While it is true that the French Government could do more in publicizing the Marshall plan to the French people, we do not believe that it is accurate to say, as the report does that the French Government is mute on the Marshall plan. There are evidences at hand to dispute such an arbitrary statement."

This parliamentary uncertainty in France becomes clear when contrasted with the startling, vigorous, and unreserved activity of the British Government.

The British contrast: The British Government's campaign to inform England of the economic facts of life, in the course of which it must necessarily bring in the Marshall plan, throws a harsh light on the indecision of the French Government. It is ironic that in France, where the urgency is greatest the effort is least, and that in Britain where Communist activity is weak, the government information program is greatest.

It must be acknowledged that obstacles affecting the French information task do not exist in Britain to the extent they exist in France. The British Government is substantially united on the necessity of informing its people. There is practically no challeng to the labor government's information campaign on the ground that it is political or foreign. Government pronouncements and campaigns are not met with the suspicion and hostility that are voiced in France. The press is not distrusted, and other media of communication are generally more modern and more effective.

When ECA's public information officer arrived on the scene in Britain he found a year-old government agency that was doggedly going about the job of telling the British population about Britain economic crisis and what must be done to resolve it. It was immediately recognized that this was the vehicle for informing the public about the Marshall plan (the fact that outside aid was necessary simply pointed up Britain's economic plight). ECA has channeled most of its information through this government agency.

It is known as the Economic Information Unit, is a direct function of the Government operating under the Treasury, was set up in 1947 in the belief that the recovery of the United Kingdom would be long and difficult, and that the more people knew about their economic debacle the more they would pull together to overcome it. The office has a staff of some 20 operating personnel, a budget of over $2,000,000, which is four times as great as ECA's entire European budget for its first year, and is headed by a top-salaried official. It is divided into sections, one of which is dedicated entirely to the role of the Marshall plan.

The British Government's economic information unit is not only disseminating a great variety of instruction but is doing so as state policy. It is using the press, radio, films, exhibitions, pamphlets, posters, lectures, special community "weeks," bulletins for management, and management-labor meetings. It quotes an impressive statistical index of coverage, and ECA itself is able to point to an equally imposing array of figures on dissemination of Marshall plan information.

Since the French Government has done nothing comparable and since it faces some real difficulties in doing so, the question is raised whether it can or will ever explain the plan effectively.

The answer is discouraging. The Government could do an effective job of explaining it only when a continuing majority of its political parties believes that explaining it is worth while. Since they are not so convinced, the only conclusion is that the French and American Governments take a different view of the importance of the American effort.

ECA INFORMATION ACTIVITIES IN FRANCE

There is one organization in France that has made an intelligent and consistent effort to get the western side of the story across to France—the ECA information team. This is not to say that it has succeeded; the odds against its doing so on its own are too great. But no account of information on the Marshall plan in France should slight the intensity of its work, the ability of its staff, and its understanding of the delicacy of the job.

The top echelon of the organization is the information section of the OSR. It has a staff of 40 persons, including clerks and non-Americans, to handle all of the work in a program designed to carry the Marshall-plan story directly or indirectly to some 270,000,000 Europeans in 19 countries. It coordinates the activities of all ECA country missions, services American and foreign correspondents with Marshall plan news, provides ECA in Washington with news and feature material about the plan as it is operating; in addition, it assists the French mission in carrying the local information program.

Information specifically for and concerning France is handled by the information section of the ECA French mission with a staff of nine people, inclusive of clerical help and non-Americans.

Assisting OSR and the French mission is the public-affairs section of the American Embassy in Paris which has supervision over the United States Information Service (USIS). This unit has a handful of personnel in the Paris office and five officers in five cities in France. There is a functional division of work between the ECA information units and the USIS. Generally, ECA originates material and USIS supplies the distribution facilities. The arrangement appears to be working well and has confirmed the judgment which led ECA to set up specialized information teams to handle its specialized informational jobs.

The Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) has a five-man publicity staff, but most observers agree that it has not begun to realize its potential as a voice that can speak to western Europe.

The results of the combined efforts of these organizations are impressive when measured in terms of the small number of personnel attempting to get the western story to the French.

The Voice of America as heard in France, carries Marshall-plan news and feature stories. The French radio and French press carry a certain amount of Marshall-plan news and some features and editorials about it. Results of the deliberations of OEEC are given a fair amount of recognition and coverage. More than 100,000 persons receive, by request, a biweekly publication (l'Aide Americain) put out by the French Mission. Americans, and some French officials, draw attention to the Marshall plan in public speeches. A few exhibits have been produced and are being displayed at fairs and agricultural expositions. Pamphlets are produced and distributed. Some releases are directed at non-Communist labor groups. Statistically, ECA can point to a considerable monthly output of information through various media.

But though the ECA and allied forces have been able to get material before an audience to this extent, the over-all results are not impressive when measured against the objectives, when measured against the effectiveness of the vast Communist output, or when measured against the incontestable fact that great masses of French people know little and believe less about the idea back of the American effort.

The odds have been too great. They have been out-manned and out-financed. Most important, the Americans are foreigners, and under the best of circumstances there is a definite limit to what can be disseminated to the French public directly by foreigners. As noted previously, the Communists, in their pose as Frenchmen, are not confronted by this obstacle.

Despite the obstacles—chiefly financial and psychological—recognized earlier in this report, there is a potential program for overcoming each difficulty in its own sphere.

CONCLUSIONS

Two specific steps can and should be taken to increase reception and understanding of the Marshall plan in France:

1. ECA, in cooperation with USIS, should substantially increase its information activities in France.

2. The United States Government should drive home to the French Government the probable consequences of failure to inform the French people of the objectives of the 4-year aid project.

According to ECA officials, they plan an acceleration of the ECA information program in France. Whether that acceleration will hit a fast enough pace remains to be seen. But in view of the stakes involved the additional effort (most of which can be financed with counterpart funds) should not be left to chance. It should have been undertaken earlier.

Basically, however, the achievement of results on a sufficient scale rests with the French Government. The effort must be made by Frenchmen, by the French press, radio motion picture organizations, labor, and all other appropriate media and organizations. They are the ones, perhaps the only ones, who can talk to their own people. Why expect a people to accept the message of a foreign nation if its own government drags its feet?

As pointed out earlier in this report, the parties in French coalition cannot and will not undertake any informational program unless they are convinced that the end outweighs political differences. There are no signs that such a conviction is about to emerge, and the United States as well as France faces the consequences.

Administrator Hoffman's comment is as follows:

"In its conclusions, the report recommends a substantial increase in information activities in France by ECA in cooperation with the United States Information Service. It also recommends that the United States Government should drive home to the French Government the probable consequences of failure to inform the French people of the objectives of the Marshall plan. Steps to accomplish this are already under way and are being developed with vigor in the full realization that we have no time to lose."

THE GENOCIDE TREATY

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the United Nations convention outlawing genocide awaits action by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Genocide, which is the mass destruction of a national racial or religious group, was outlawed by the United Nations in December 1948. The convention entered into at that time was signed by 21 nations, including the United States. In the past 18 months, 15 of those nations have ratified the treaty. Ratification by the Senate of the United States is conspicuous by its absence.

The Genocide Treaty is a most significant step in the development of international law and international morality. By officially declaring that genocide is a crime against the world and against humanity and a violation of international law, it marks a most significant advance toward the replacement of force by morality as the mainspring of world affairs. Individual murder has long headed the list of internationally recognized and extraditable crimes. Nevertheless, group murder has never been legally curbed.

We can take pride in the fact that American representatives were leaders in bringing the United Nations to adopt the antigenocide convention. In this respect, I want to pay special tribute to Prof. Raphael Lemkin, visiting lecturer in law, Yale University. The provisions of the Genocide Treaty embody American principles of justice and morality. The United States has everything to gain and nothing to lose by the advancement of those principles throughout the world.

I urge the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate of the United States to ratify the Genocide Convention promptly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Humanity Is Our Client," which appeared in the New York Times of June 11, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HUMANITY IS OUR CLIENT

The Genocide Treaty should not be permitted to go by default. Must more national or political groups be wiped out or kidnapped (as thousands of Greek children have been kidnapped) before the United States calls genocide an international crime and invokes, in concert with other nations, swift and just punishments? There is hardly a representative group in the country—labor, veterans, citizens' committees, women's clubs, clergymen, businessmen, public officials—that has not thrown its support behind prompt action on ratification of the treaty. Yet once again we face the prospect of time running out, as adjournment of Congress nears.

In the international councils preceding the acceptance of the pact in the United Nations the United States fought hard for its adoption. In the past 18 months 15 nations have ratified the convention—ironically, all of them small nations. Twenty ratifications are needed to make the treaty law and binding upon nations. Is the United States to lose its moral leadership in this good cause?

The pact is awaiting action and recommendations by the Foreign Relations Committee; from there it proceeds to the Senate floor for full debate. The President has long indicated that he stands ready to ratify on the Senate's recommendation, and time is of the essence. As Prof. Raphael Lemkin, one of the pact's chief architects puts it: "Humanity is our client. Every day of delay is concession to crime." The United States cannot be a party to that concession.

PLATFORM OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE FOR 1917 AND 1918

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in the course of the recent debate on S. 1728, a bill to create an FEPC, the allegation was repeatedly made by the opposition that the movement for FEPC had its origin in the Communist Party platform of 1928. I repudiated that allegation on the floor of the Senate, and consider it an affront to all the millions of American men and women who are in favor of FEPC legislation because it is consistent with their religious principles and not because of any political considerations. In fact, I pointed out that FEPC legislation was in reality the one thing the Communist Party in America did not want to see enacted because it would undermine their activities here in the United States.

I now bring to the attention of the Senate further documentation which once and for all demonstrates the injustice and unfairness in connection with the attempts to besmirch this legislation with a Communist tag. I have in my hand a photostat of the platform of the National Association for Colored People for the years 1917 and 1918. It is a summary of the eighth and ninth annual reports of that organization published in January 1919.

I ask unanimous consent that the cover page and page 76 of that platform be incorporated at this point in the RECORD. It clearly demonstrates that one of the objectives of this organization from its early years was equal opportunity in employment.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE FOR THE YEARS 1917 AND 1918—EIGHTH AND NINTH ANNUAL REPORTS—A SUMMARY OF WORK AND AN ACCOUNTING—JANUARY 1919

X. THE TASK FOR THE FUTURE—A PROGRAM FOR 1919

First and foremost among the objectives for 1919 must be the strengthening of the association's organization and resources. Its general program must be adapted to specific ends. Its chief aims have many times been stated:

1. A vote for every Negro man and woman on the same terms as for white men and women.

2. An equal chance to acquire the kind of an education that will enable the Negro everywhere wisely to use this vote.

3. A fair trial in the courts for all crimes of which he is accused, by judges in whose election he has participated without discrimination because of race.

4. A right to sit upon the jury which passes judgment upon him.

5. Defense against lynching and burning at the hands of mobs.

6. Equal service on railroad and other public carriers. This to mean sleeping-car service, dining-car service, pullman service, at the same cost and upon the same terms as other passengers.

7. Equal right to the use of public parks, libraries, and other community services for which he is taxed.

8. An equal chance for a livelihood in public and private employment.

9. The abolition of color-hyphenation and the substitution of straight Americanism.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the further pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for a quorum call be rescinded and that further proceedings under the call be suspended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, we have before us today a bill consisting of 391 pages. It deals with one of the most complicated and intricate subjects that any legislative body ever attempted to handle.

During my 10 years of service on the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the most arduous duty I discharged was in an effort to improve the original Social Security Act, which was passed, as I recall, in 1935.

The fiscal basis of the original Social Security Act was, first, that we would set up a self-supporting, self-liquidating insurance fund; and, second, that we would create a trust fund of approximately $50,000,000,000, with which to meet death benefits and retirement claims, which would accumulate through the years, and finally would reach a very large amount.

However, that plan was criticized—and, I think, properly so—from the standpoint that the payroll taxes imposed, one-half of the amount to be paid by the employer and one-half to be paid by the employee, to finance this insurance system would be spent by the Government as received, and the Government would then put in the trust fund what some persons called the Government's I O U. Of course, it was a little bit more than what is ordinarily called an I O U, because it was an official Government bond; but the fact remained that when the demand for payments exceeded the current income and the Government was forced to resort to this trust fund for payment, new taxes would have to be imposed to get the money, unless the Government was running at a surplus at that time and could afford to sell some of its bonds on the open market, in order to obtain money.

In 1937, as I recall, months of hearings were held on this problem. We had the benefit of so-called experts in social security and we had the benefit of so-called mortuary experts and pension experts. However, Mr. President, I soon became convinced that if there was any man on any committee who really knew how to frame a system of this kind and at the same time to properly and adequately evaluate the political considerations which grew out of the various proposals for coverage and in regard to how the collections could be made, that man could get a job at any time he wanted at a salary of $50,000 or $75,000 or $100,000 with any one of the big insurance companies. On our committee we simply did not have such experts. In fact, I doubt that there is any living man who could take these nearly 400 pages of a bill which, as I have said, deals with this very difficult subject, and could analyze them and could tell exactly what is in the bill and how it will work out 10, 15, or 30 years from now.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, the best experts we had before us claimed that they wanted at least a 25-percent margin of error in all of their computations. They said that was about as close as they could gage earning power on which the tax would be levied; increases or decreases in employment; the opportunities for men to remain employed up to a given age; and the inherent difficulties of collections—if, for instance, the program was extended to cover those who keep no regular books, such as domestics, and who perhaps would be given a book in which they would paste stamps; and the difficulty of bringing farmers under the system, inasmuch as farmers ordinarily keep no regular books, to say nothing of the fact that only a few years ago the average income of the average farmer in the United States was only $600. To require him to provide old-age pensions and so-called security for either his regular or his temporary employees would present a problem which we did not know how to solve.

In the preparation of House bill 6000, the House committee spent weeks on the hearings, and still further weeks in executive sessions. Then the House passed the bill and sent it to the Senate. That happened last October.

Off and on, for most of the present session, the Senate Finance Committee, composed of some of the very ablest Members of the Senate, have been at work on this bill.

Frankly, Mr. President, it would be presumptuous for me, without having attended all those hearings; without having had an opportunity to read the voluminous record compiled by the committee—it would take weeks and weeks to read it; without attending any of the executive sessions where the conflicting viewpoints and views and matters were debated back and forth, to attempt to analyze or criticize what is contained in the Senate version of House bill 6000.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Is not that a very good reason why the suggestion by Members of the Senate that additional studies be made by the Senate on this subject, is in order?

Mr. ROBERTSON. Undoubtedly. Yet after 2 years of study, we are expected to do something on this subject now. However, it was my understanding that it was the opinion of the distinguished members of the Senate Finance Committee that they have gone as far as they dare to go in this bill, and then they propose that before we go any further, the best possible study be made of what is involved.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. What I particularly had in mind was that some of the areas of coverage which are lacking in this measure, should be the object of additional studies on the part of the proper committee and on the part of the Senate itself. Does the Senator agree that that is about the only practical way we can approach this matter on a businesslike basis?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wholeheartedly agree. It would be unfair to ourselves and perhaps very harmful to the Nation we are trying to serve if we were to move blindly into so technical a subject, however much we should like to see a complete coverage of social security for the entire Nation. I fully agree with the distinguished Senator from Kansas that the coverage which is not provided by the Senate version of House bill 6000 should be studied, with an indication given to those who are not covered that all appropriate suggestions concerning their future coverage will be fully considered by the Congress.

However, Mr. President, it is my understanding that the coverage in the Senate version of House bill 6000 is substantially larger than that of the House version of the bill. My distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], helped to frame the bill, and he is now on the floor of the Senate. If I am in error on that point—let me repeat that I have not had an opportunity to fully analyze this bill—I should be glad to have him correct me.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator is correct; the coverage has been substantially changed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, my distinguished predecessor, the late Carter Glass, used to tell me that WALTER GEORGE, of Georgia, was one of the noblest men he ever knew, and one of the ablest men with whom he had served throughout a very long legislative career, first in the House, then in the Senate. In the multitude of duties which are pressed upon every Member of the Senate, it becomes a matter of physical impossibility for him to be fully and adequately advised about every bill which comes before the Senate. I happen to be sitting on the Banking and Currency Committee, which has, at this session, reported more bills, excepting private bills which go on the Senate Calendar, than any other committee of the Congress. We have had more hearings on bills, so our clerk tells me, than almost any other committee of the Congress. I might except the Finance Committee, which has had before it these two very highly technical and controversial matters, the social security bill and certain matters relating to taxation. And I am also serving on five subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee. And so I say, Mr. President, that every Senator in certain phases of his legislative work must to some extent rely upon the demonstrated ability and the demonstrated correctness of those who bring legislation to the floor of the Senate for the consideration of their colleagues. I am happy therefore whenever a man of the stature of WALTER GEORGE, of Georgia, brings a bill before us and tells us that under all the circumstances it is about as good as he was able to do.

It is also a source of gratification to me when the senior Senator from Virginia puts his name to a bill and asks favorable consideration by his colleagues, because I have been associated with him in a very close way from the time we were desk mates in the Senate of Virginia, commencing in January 1916. I know, as his other colleagues in the Senate have so well learned to know, his business judgment and the care with which he scrutinizes all proposals which may result in a tax burden upon the American people.

Last night I was discussing the Senate bill with a Member of the House who had been very active in the preparation of the House version of the pending measure. He told me, and possibly it was quite natural for him to think so, that he thought the House bill was better than the Senate committee bill. I said, "Why do you say that?" He replied, "In the first place, the Senate committee bill increases the benefits to be paid, and decreases the tax collections with which to pay them." I have had no opportunity since last night to check the provisions of the House bill against those of the Senate committee bill, and so I merely give as my authority one member of the House committee who assigned that as one reason for his believing that the House bill was a sounder bill than the Senate committee bill.

Back in 1937, all proponents of social security and all the experts who testified before us said that our objective was to be a self-supporting insurance plan. At every hearing we had from then until I left the committee to come to the Senate side in 1946, those experts constantly told us we were dealing with a 3-percent program. That was on the basis of the old benefits. What did they mean by that? They meant a program under which it would be necessary for both employer and employee to contribute 3 percent to the fund during the working period of the employee, if we were to have a self-supporting program, one that did not eventually have to turn to the Federal Treasury for the promised benefits.

It is unnecessary to do more than review the repeated action of the Congress to stop the step-up of the payroll taxes, and to look at the payroll taxes which are carried in the House version of the pending measure and the Senate version of it, to know that we do not have a 3-percent program. We have a program which undoubtedly is headed for a very large deficit, from the standpoint of being self-supporting, at a date not too far distant.

Just what solution we should make of that serious problem I am not prepared to say. I am glad, however, that it is the plan of the Senate Finance Committee not only to make a further study of additional coverage, but I am sure that it must cover a study of how this plan is to be financed in the future, whether we will keep the payroll taxes down and have just enough to meet current demands on the fund, or whether we will put them up to meet the accruing liability. If so, how will we preserve and how will we invest an accumulated fund of that kind so that it will not in the end be dissipated perhaps on domestic spending schemes of various kinds, and then face the necessity of placing an additional tax upon employees who have already paid a special tax for the pension that will be paid to them in their retirement?

It is my present intention, Mr. President, to support House bill 6000, but I shall consider some of the amendments which I understand will be offered, because I understand there was not complete agreement in the Finance Committee on everything that was included in this bill, which was reported, I believe, by a unanimous vote. As a matter of fact, I do not feel that I am disclosing any confidences when I say that the distinguished chairman of the committee recently told me, when I asked him what he thought of the bill which had been reported, that he thought possibly there could be several amendments adopted on the floor that would improve the Senate bill.

I shall vote for the bill with such appropriate amendments as I may see fit to support from the floor, because I realize the necessity for a pension system under the economic conditions as they have been developed in this country.

We are in the grip of a machine age which attaches more importance to physical vigor and alertness than to maturity of judgment and experience. As a result, the age at which men can remain gainfully employed is being reduced, and the age at which a man can reenter industry, if he is so unfortunate as to lose his job, is being materially reduced. It is almost impossible, Mr. President, for any industrial worker past the age of 50 years to enter a new firm; and the requirement of retirement at 65 years of age is becoming almost universal in the large industrial areas of our Nation. While this machine age, which weds the nimbleness of a man's fingers to an electrically operated machine and requires a minimum of his brain power and experience, is gradually easing men out of gainful employment, our doctors, thanks to a remarkable advance in medical science, are adding approximately 5 years to the life span of the average man. As a result, we find the number of those persons above 60 years of age increasing at a far more rapid rate than we anticipated 10, 15, or 20 years ago, and we find a growing sentiment among children that it is the duty of the State, and not their duty and loving privilege, to support their parents in old age. There never has been a time in this Nation, so far as I know, Mr. President, when the average man, to say nothing of that large segment of workers receiving below the average income, could save enough during his active working years to provide comfortable and adequate income in his sunset years. They did try to buy a little home, and they usually could do it if they would work and save. They sometimes carried a little insurance, but generally that was for the protection of the widow; it was not for their lifetime. They usually raised large families and trained the children to think that one of their duties in mature life was to return to the parents the care and love expended on the children in their infancy and as they were growing up. Unfortunately, that sentiment in this Nation is changing, and it is not a change for the best. It is doing something to our families; it is tending to disintegrate the ties which in the past have held families together.

Mr. President, this morning I received a letter from a friend touching on this subject, which I want to read to the Senate, because I think it is a thought-provoking letter. It reads as follows:

JUNE 12, 1950.

The Honorable A. WILLIS ROBERTSON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ROBERTSON: Upon my recent return from a brief sojourn on my farm near Charlottesville, I found the copy of your speech on the Preservation of Private Enterprise you have been so kind to send me. I have read it with genuine interest and I think it is excellent. The kind of thinking and concepts voiced by you, it seems to me, represents the type of philosophy under which this Nation has grown great. The trend away from the sound doctrine enunciated by you, however, is something about which, I think, there is a woeful lack of due concern throughout the Nation. Our people (maybe it is true of all people), are dangerously inclined toward complacency until they are personally pinched.

I suspect Captain Kincaid had passed on to you the copy I had given him of a speech delivered by the vice president of Marshall Field Co. in Chicago. His views, similar I believe, to yours, had, I thought, been set forth quite well.

In a speech recently delivered somewhere, perhaps before the board of directors, by Benjamin A. Fairless, president of the United States Steel Corp., I noted an enunciation of views similar to yours, bearing upon the importance, indeed the vital essentiality of private enterprise, if our way of life is to endure. I think if you have not already seen a copy of the Fairless speech entitled "Man's Search for Security," you would be interested in noting some of his comments which I will quote verbatim as follows:

"I believe, and I think you do too, that all human beings grow in dignity and self-respect by reason of accomplishment and the assumption of responsibility. The spirit of independence, or of confidence, or of self-reliance, is mightily nourished by the exercise of one's own efforts. Moral stature is increased and moral fiber is strengthened by each job done with the free play of one's own ability. Ambition, which inspires men to attainment, is fed by an atmosphere of endeavor. In short, a man develops by standing on his own feet. He does not wax strong by having others do for him what he can and should do for himself.

"Are we interested in the cultivation of these qualities in our own citizenry? Have we properly appraised the value of the spirit they create, in terms of a powerful influence for the preservation of freedom in America? If this land of opportunity, where men traditionally have enjoyed more independence than in any other, is to maintain that national spirit which has blessed it from the very beginning, it must carefully foster the dignity, self-respect, moral stature, and self-reliance of the millions of individuals which make up the integrated whole.

"Too much coddling, too much paternalism, too much recession from personal responsibility can have a decidedly weakening effect upon the aims and purposes of man. With the possibility of lapsing into a feeling of security provided wholly by others, the time-honored emphasis upon thrift is pushed into the background, and one of the spurs to maximum effort becomes inoperative. We should take thought then, serious thought, that in our over-all approach to this matter of planning security, we do not adopt methods which will wither the spirit while catering to the needs of the flesh. Already we find that many young men who are on the point of entering industry inquire first about pensions, benefits, and other elements of social security to be provided for them, while they manifest secondary interest in the opportunities lying ahead for a successful career, based upon the exercise of their own abilities. Little is the wonder that this distortion has taken place, with the atmosphere so filled with conflicting discussions about the merits of guaranteeing security throughout the entire span of life, with socialized this and socialized that applying at every point."

There is no question in my mind that too much ado over security at the expense of a healthy interest in opportunity has come to be the order of the day.

I have no doubt that this Nation abounds with individuals sufficiently endowed with common sense and realistic convictions to guide its destiny safely and efficiently, and I am not concerned so much over the fact that there are individuals in high offices whose ideas seem to be detrimental to the best interests of the country as I am with the evident reality that the voting public contains sufficient members of an ilk likewise imbued with questionable ideas to vote their candidates into high office. In fact, the alarming aspect of this situation is that this type of citizen seems to be on the increase.

History seems to indicate that given time, society always succeeds in socializing itself. It is nevertheless my doctrine that the view that history repeats itself, is fallacious. History only points its finger at what to expect unless men of vision and courage and enthusiasm and energy rise up and do something about it. Someone has observed that social security as it is being dished up to us today, is a sort of death. Security is not a living instrument unless it is a part of our own effort and planning. It is the striving for security that really preserves it. Security cannot be promised, bestowed, or endowed. It is the product of each individual's work, planning, saving, thinking, and holding. Security is not security when it is only a politically promised social gain. It is then a political gain and an individual loss.

George Washington uttered a profound truth when he said, "He who seeks security through surrender of liberty loses both."

With kindest regards and best wishes, sir, and again thanks for the copy of your fine address.

I shall not include the name of the writer of that letter, because I am using it today without having had an opportunity to get his consent to use it. Therefore I am not at liberty to disclose his name. I am sure that he would have no objection to my using his splendid statement about what now confronts us to illustrate my point that while a machine age and a highly socialized state, together with an economy which is rapidly maturing, is forcing us to provide so-called security by way of old-age pensions and retirements we must not in our enthusiasm for that type of program, which may be very popular politically, lose sight of the fundamental fact that the greatest security for the people of this Nation is the security which comes from a system of private enterprise in which there are openings for men of brains, energy, and ability, and employment for which there is an adequate reward for those who prove their superiority in those high fields. The writer of the letter from which I have quoted referred to a speech which Mr. Benjamin Fairless had made on some previous occasion. I recently saw a copy of a speech which Mr. Fairless had made in Boston. I believe it was made on the 19th of May. I have a copy of that speech before me, Mr. President, but as I am already late for a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations, where we shall be engaged in marking up a very important appropriation bill, I shall not take the time to read from this speech as I had previously intended to do. The speech is built around the theme that there are some bodies or groups of bodies in Washington which are throwing monkey wrenches into the business machine. Mr. Fairless said that if certain manufacturers get together and fix a price for their product they get prosecuted under the antitrust laws for price fixing. If they do not get together and attempt to meet competition in a given area by absorbing freight, they are prosecuted under the Robinson-Patman Act. He said thousands of manufacturers do not know which way to turn. They do know that whichever way they turn will be wrong. We tried to take that one monkey wrench out the other day when we passed S. 1008. Oh, how that bill has been misrepresented, Mr. President. The druggists of Virginia were the largest group that applied pressure on me from the time the conference report on S. 1008 reached the Senate until the final vote was taken on the bill. I do not know one in that group who has not benefited from freight absorption. We do not have any great drug manufacturing concerns in Virginia. We buy from a firm in Baltimore or from its branch office in Norfolk. There is a big firm from which we buy which is located near the border between Virginia and Tennessee. It is in Bristol. I do not know whether it is Bristol, Va., or Bristol, Tenn. However, it is down in the far corner of Virginia. Yet every druggist in Virginia can get a proprietary remedy at the same price anywhere in the State, because the manufacturer absorbs the freight on it, and it is sold at the same price under the Robinson-Patman Act. Suppose there was some small drug manufacturing company which was selling all over the United States. It could not absorb freight if the President vetoes S. 1008, nor could he build a series of new plants.

I hope the President does not veto that bill. I am satisfied that the amendment, prepared by the Attorney General and included in the conference report, is an adequate safeguard against anti-trust-law violations.

I asked a very distinguished representative of our Government how S. 1008 was going to come out.

He said, "The best I can tell, it is 50–50."

I said, "Do you mean that the President is just as apt to veto that bill as to sign it?"

"Well," he said, "he has some mighty strong friends urging him to sign it, and some equally strong friends urging him not to sign it."

He cannot be quite like the candidate who was running for the legislature. He was young and inexperienced, and one of his political advisers said, "Now, Bill, you are going out to sell yourself to the people. You're going to make some speeches to the people. There is one thing you must not do; you must not say anything about that squirrel law."

Bill said, "I will not."

He got through his speeches fine until he got to the last night, when he made a powerful speech, because he saw victory in his grasp. He warmed up, and really went to town. Just before he sat down, one old farmer in the hall said, "Bill, you haven't said anything about that squirrel law."

Bill said, "My friend, I'm awfully glad you raised that question. I have some mighty good friends in favor of the squirrel law, and I have some mighty good friends who are opposed to the squirrel law, and I want to tell you I'm going to stick by my friends." [Laughter.]

I express the earnest hope—although it would not have any immediate effect on H. R. 6000—that the President will not veto the basing-point bill, because jobs are more important than pensions. Jobs come before pensions, unless we are going to knock the bung out of the Treasury and distribute the benefits of the accumulated wealth of past generations. One of the things that will stimulate business and help to make jobs is the removal of the present uncertainty as to what a man can do and what he cannot do and remain in business and stay out of jail.

LABOR MONOPOLY

Mr. President, there is another bill pending in the Senate. I do not expect to get any action on it this year, but I do wish to mention it so that it may be close to the hearts of my distinguished colleagues after November. I refer to the bill I introduced last January to amend the antitrust laws to provide that labor leaders exercising a monopoly shall not exercise that monopoly to unreasonably restrain production or to fix prices of goods or services that are of national interest and concern.

Consider the situation which confronts the coal industry. It was a consideration of that situation that got me into the study of labor monopoly, the 3-day week, the 2-day week, the 1-day week, and the no-day week.

The price of coal is now so high that our distinguished colleagues from West Virginia and other coal-producing States are coming to us with tears in their eyes, asking us to put what would amount to a prohibitive tariff on the importation of foreign fuel oil, in order that coal from Virginia, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania may not lose its historic market in New England. That market is being lost today, and what is the effect? It means unemployment in the coal mines; it means fewer and fewer to work and pay payroll taxes for the benefit of those who are retired.

Mr. President, the hearings on my bill are now available. The bill was favorably reported to the full committee by a very fine subcommittee composed of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. DONNELL], three very able and fine Members of the Senate. They heard the evidence. They considered it very maturely, and unanimously reported the bill to the full Committee on the Judiciary. As I have said, the hearings are now available. I hope the Members of the Senate will read them. They are very illuminating.

Another thing I feel we have to consider in connection with any bill like H. R. 6000, to levy taxes on those who work to take care of those too old to work is whether those who are able to work are going to have jobs. If they are, let Congress impose no unreasonable burden upon those who are willing to save and invest their funds in plants and equipment which would afford others the opportunity of working.

It is said that it now takes an average of $10,000 to give just one man a job in a plant. The time has passed when the blacksmith could go out under the spreading chestnut tree, with an anvil and a bellows and a big hammer, and hammer out his horseshoes by the sweat of his brow. He could do that in the old days. He could stay out under any old chestnut tree where there was fresh air and romance. When I was a boy there was nothing I enjoyed more than to see the great muscles of the blacksmith and to smell the odor of the burning horse hoof. I was a farm boy, and loved everything about horses. But the blacksmith could make only 12½ cents an hour. He could not get by on that now. He would starve to death, I do not care how hard he would work. His prototype is now working for General Motors, or United States Steel, making $2 to $2.50 an hour, not sweating nearly as much. He is making what looks like good money, but he does not know whether he is going to be there after he is 60 or not. He knows he is certainly not going to be there after he is 65. That is why I favor a social-security system, and I think we should do what we can to make it a good and comprehensive one.

We have also to consider whether we are going to continue the boast that with 7 percent of the population of the world we produce 50 percent of the world's wealth. We have to consider the plans under which men with $10,000 jobs are willing to save and invest their money in order to give the worker a chance to start in life, and to qualify for a social-security pension.

Mr. President, I am glad to see before me today my distinguished colleague, the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]. Last fall we had a delightful trip together through 14 countries of Europe. He and I did a good deal of inquiring about why those countries were hard up, why they needed so many billions from us. That was not so strange for a distinguished representative from a State which is listed in our statistical books as having the lowest per capita income among all the States of the Union. Virginia cannot boast too much about per capita income, but fortunately we have a few great industrial plants, and have diversified our farming a little, and are not as poor as we used to be, though, we cannot boast too much. But we wanted to find out what was the matter in Europe.

One of the things we ascertained was that many rich people of France, Italy, and Greece were evading income taxes.

Second, we found that there were plenty of people with money over there who would not put it into their own industries, simply because they did not trust their governments, or did not know whether communism was going to involve them from within or without. They had their money in hiding, or they had it in the banks of Switzerland.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is talking about the flight of capital from Greece into Switzerland. The Senator will recall that back in 1931 and 1932 in this country there was a flight of money out of America into Canada and to other countries because people feared at that particular time that the economy of this country was on the rocks. The Senator will recall that many of those who had a great deal of money took their money out of the country because they had no confidence in their own Government at that particular time.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I know that is true. And in 1934, over the protest of my distinguished predecessor, in whose judgment I had great confidence, the late Senator Carter Glass, I voted that the United States go off the gold standard because people were hoarding gold at a time when we were facing a shortage of money and at a time of great depression. Senator Glass always claimed that was an immoral act. It was of doubtful legality, I admit. The Government promises a man to pay him in gold, and then says, "Forget about it. We will pay you in a silver certificate or a bank note of the Federal Reserve System." But in my opinion we were forced to do it.

Oh, I will say to our distinguished majority leader, I do not stand on this floor and try to condone everything that has happened in this country in the last 50 years. There has been plenty of selfishness in industry. There were plenty of industries financially able to set up a company-pension plan and a health plan and things they did not do until some labor union compelled them to do it.

I shall always rejoice in the fact that the main railroad that serves Virginia, the Norfolk & Western, years ago adopted a pension system for all its employees, from the lowest to the highest—a liberal pension plan. Those employees did not want to go into the Railroad Retirement Act when it was first passed because they thought they would be better off under their own company plan.

There were two other railroads in Virginia, however, that did not have any retirement plan at all, and, so far as I know, would not have one today if we had not passed the Railroad Retirement Act.

Incidentally, I take some credit for working out, after the Supreme Court had set that act aside, because of its unsound fiscal provision, a sound fiscal plan that stood up and is providing a fine retirement system for the railroads. Naturally I did not appreciate it when I was placed on the railroad brotherhood's black list in 1948, but that is one of the hazards one incurs for having supported the Taft-Hartley Act which specifically exempted the railroad brotherhoods. But they did not draw a fair distinction.

I will leave that subject now. The Senator from Illinois got me a little bit off the subject.

I want to go back to my statement that I do not condone the selfishness of those corporations who combined and squeezed the last dollar out of the consumer. But that is no excuse for condoning labor leaders now who are exercising more power than the corporations ever tried to exercise in their control of certain basic industries. It is all tied up with the social security program, because there is your job. I definitely believe that if we can economize in spending, if we can reduce the tax on corporations, if we can ease upon that super-duper tax in the higher brackets where we tax first the earning that a man's money has made in the corporation, and when it comes to him as a dividend less 38 percent, we hook him again for a top of more than 80 percent. If we can ease that sum, if we will encourage those men to use their savings for plant expansion, to give more jobs, that is just as important as a plan to pension workers. If we do not have workers to tax as we go along, we have no funds to pay those who have already retired or will shortly retire, except out of the public.

Mr. President, I hope my distinguished colleagues will forgive me for attempting to discuss a bill concerning which I know so little. But I explained at the outset that I do not believe there is any Member of the Senate or the House who can sit down and tell us everything that is in the bill, and I know there is not one who can tell us how the provisions of the bill are going to be working 10 years from now. There are provisions in the bill which we take on faith. There are things we have to go along with because the general program is what we approve, even though we do not know all the details.

I conclude as I began; I rejoice that two so outstanding friends and colleagues as the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] have brought this bill to us with their endorsement, which makes it much easier for me to accept it without the kind of knowledge I like to have and try to have when I am voting on a program that will ultimately run into billions of dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not prepared to offer amendments now, but I give notice that I shall offer an amendment which I hope the Finance Committee will approve, making the effective date of the appropriation for the children's fund carried in the bill, the date of the enactment of the act itself, so that advance planning may be quite possible both for the agency and for the States.

I also give notice that I shall, for myself, offer an amendment to bring under coverage traveling salesmen who work for one employer principally, and who takes orders for delivery by the manufacturer or the wholesaler. This amendment I hope to be able to present tomorrow for printing.

REFERENCE OF RESOLUTION CALLING FOR INVESTIGATION OF THE HANDLING OF THE AMERASIA CASE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I should respectfully like to make inquiry of the distinguished Vice President, who now occupies the Chair, as to when he expects to refer to a committee the resolution (S. Res. 295) I submitted yesterday regarding the handling of the Amerasia case by the Department of Justice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not able to state the exact hour and minute when the reference will be made, but the Chair will announce his decision when he makes it. However, it will not be made today.

Mr. CAPEHART. It will not be made today?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. CAPEHART. Might it be made tomorrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That might be; but the Chair is looking into certain phases of the matter on which he would like to satisfy himself before making the reference.

Mr. CAPEHART. I thank the Chair.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT REGARDING CALL OF THE CALENDAR ON FRIDAY

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, apparently there are no other speeches to be made today upon the pending bill.

We have reached an agreement to vote upon the bill and all amendments thereto at 4 o'clock on next Tuesday. In the meantime, I think it goes without saying that there will be a certain lull in the debate, and it may be possible on Friday to take up some measures which are now pending on the calendar. I have reference particularly to Calendar No. 1790, House bill 7579, to extend the Rubber Act of 1948, and for other purposes.

If there are any conference reports, Mr. President, which are ready to be taken up on tomorrow, I hope we may be able to do so.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. With reference to the suggestion made by the distinguished majority leader that on tomorrow, if there comes a time when there is a lull in the debate on the social security bill, one of the bills which he might move to have the Senate take up would be House bill 7579, Calendar No. 1790, a bill to extend the Rubber Act of 1948, let me inquire whether the majority leader has been advised that some members of the Banking and Currency Committee want the bill recommitted to that committee.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not believe there is a desire on the part of any Members on this side of the aisle to have the bill recommitted to the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. If it is not to be recommitted, I believe there are some members who wish to file a supplemental report. I mention this because I wish to cooperate in every way with the majority leader in getting before the Senate any other proposed legislation which it is possible to consider tomorrow, in the event there is a lull in the debate on the social security bill.

Of course the majority leader has said it would be up to whatever Members who wish to file supplemental reports to file them at that time. However, I agree that the bill should come before the Senate at an early date.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. The basic reason for the early consideration of House bill 7579 is the deadline which must be met.

Mr. WHERRY. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I should like to notify the Senate that inasmuch as there are a few bills on the calendar, on Friday I probably shall move to have the Senate consider unobjected-to bills on the calendar, beginning at the point where the call of the calendar was concluded on June 8.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, it is my understanding that that would have to be done by unanimous consent. Before I would give such unanimous consent, I certainly would like to have reports on the bills submitted to the Senate, so they can be considered. Of course that comment does not apply to some of the bills on the calendar, on which reports already have been submitted.

Mr. LUCAS. If there are no reports on certain of the bills on the calendar, and if any Senator objects to the consideration of a bill on the calendar on that ground, when the bill is reached during the call of the calendar, I say to the Senator that I, too, certainly would want the bill passed over.

Mr. WHERRY. I would not wish to join at this time in a unanimous-consent agreement relative to calling the calendar on Friday, although we may be able to work out such an agreement.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope we may be able to do so, because I would dislike very much to have the calendar run for as long as it did recently without being called.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I am delighted to hear that in the future we shall not have long delays between calendar calls. I think it is a very poor practice to let long periods of time elapse between calendar calls, and I think it will be very helpful to the Senate and will expedite the business of the Senate to have regular calendar calls in accordance with the spirit of the rule.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Since making an observation, a minute ago, regarding the announcement relative to the intention to request consent for a call of the calendar on Friday, I have been informed that most of the reports I had in mind have been filed, finally, today. If the distinguished majority leader will permit us to check this evening on the remainder of the bills I had in mind, I shall have no objection to a request for consent to have the calendar called on Friday, if a request to that effect is made at noon tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

On the calendar there is another bill to which I should like to call attention and which might be considered on Friday, in the event it is not passed during the call of the consent calendar. I refer to Senate bill 960, Calendar 1791, a bill relating to the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment. In discussing that bill a few minutes ago with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] he said he doubted that there would be any objection to the bill after a short explanation is made.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, as I understand, both those bills are on the calendar. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. So if a determination is reached to have the calendar called, those bills will be reached during the call of the calendar, in any event; will they not?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct. If at that time there is objection to the consideration of the bills during the call of the calendar, then, following the call of the calendar, we shall proceed to move to have the Senate consider them.

So far as concerns the conference report on the amendment of the Hatch Act, I am informed that we probably shall take it up tomorrow, because it is desired to get it out of the way by tomorrow, if possible.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to make a further inquiry of the majority leader. In accordance with the announcements which have been made, it seems that we are building up quite a number of things to do tomorrow and the next day. Of course, the conference report on the bill amending the Hatch Act has priority, in any event, because it is a privileged matter.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Of course, the announcements regarding the possibility of having the Senate consider certain bills tomorrow and the next day are based on the understanding that in the event on those days any Senator desires to engage in further debate on the social security bill, House bill 6000, we shall be delighted to have him do so.

Mr. WHERRY. If I correctly understand the situation, the calendar will not be called in any event until Friday.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. And that understanding includes both the bill extending the Rubber Act and the bill extending the Selective Service Act, which the Senator has mentioned; does it?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. I also understand that if there is an opportunity tomorrow to call up the conference report on the amendment of the Hatch Act, it is the intention to have that conference report considered at that time.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. Of course, it is a privileged matter.

Mr. WHERRY. Of course. There are one or two Senators who would like to be present at the time when that conference report is considered. If for any reason they cannot arrange to be present at that time, I hope the report will not be taken up then.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no executive reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the postmaster nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the call of the Executive Calendar.

RECESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, June 15, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 7, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, in the creative faith by which we really live we would bow at the altar of prayer so that even before we speak we may listen. The very justice and social welfare we are here as public servants to preserve, promote, and to protect, is rooted and grounded in Thy sovereignty. Against the debasing idolatry of the police state which, instead of shrines of prayer, rears prisons of the mind and heart, we have pledged our all. Even as with the sword of our material might we face the forces of evil rampant in the world today, we know that more vital than earthly armament, if we are to be the instruments of Thy purpose, is the putting on of the whole armor of God; for only as we fight in that shining mail can we be among the peacemakers who are called the children of God.

Keep us steadfast with the shield of Thy truth against which all the spears of hate cannot ultimately prevail. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, June 14, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 5920. An act to provide for payment of amounts due mentally incompetent personnel of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service; and

H. R. 6743. An act to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended, and title IV of the National Housing Act, as amended, and for other purposes.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, Mr. MAGNUSON was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for an indefinite period.

On request of Mr. WHERRY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. CAPEHART was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate tomorrow.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. GEORGE was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate until Monday.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Foreign Relations was authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

REFERENCE OF RESOLUTION CALLING FOR INVESTIGATION OF THE HANDLING OF THE AMERASIA CASE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I am about to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he makes the suggestion?

Mr. MCFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I wonder if the distinguished Vice President would like to express an opinion on the referral of the resolution (S. Res. 295) submitted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already expressed his intentions. If the Senator wishes the Chair to do it again, he will be glad to do so. The Chair advised the Senator from Indiana yesterday that he hoped he would be able to reach a conclusion today. The Chair is not certain that he can, but he will say definitely that if he does not reach a conclusion today, he will reach one on Monday. The Chair will not be here tomorrow.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to say that the distinguished Senator from Indiana would like to be excused tomorrow. I understand his son is to be married, and, of course, that is a good reason for being excused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair always sympathizes with ceremonies of that kind.

Mr. WHERRY. So do I. I wish to thank the distinguished Vice President.

SENATE LOYALTY INVESTIGATION—CARTOON

Mr. MCMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MCFARLAND. Yes.

Mr. MCMAHON. I should like to call the attention of the minority leader to the cartoon which appears on the first page of today's Evening Star. It shows an open door labeled: "Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Loyalty. M. TYDINGS, chairman." On the doorknob hangs a placard: "Now playing: the Amerasia case." The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is pictured as saying, "But I have not given a report as yet." The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is shown as saying, "But we definitely disagree with whatever report you are going to give."

Mr. WHERRY. I do not know why the Senator directed the attention of the minority leader to the cartoon. I am not in the cartoon. However, I should like to say, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, that I have been pictured in other cartoons in newspapers with respect to statements which I was quoted as having made about some of the witnesses. I am eager to have the report submitted forthwith, if possible, because I think the situation has many angles which ought to be cleaned up. So far as I am concerned, if reports we hear are true, I am not satisfied, as I have very constructively and forthrightly said on the floor, with the work which the committee has been doing up to date. We might just as well be frank about it. That is one of the reasons why I am a cosponsor of the resolution, and I think I was completely justified in signing it.

I did not understand this subject would come up this morning. When and if the proper time comes to discuss it, I shall be glad to make further observations on the subject. I do not want to make any accusations which are not warranted. However, as a result of some of the things that have leaked out of the committee which have a direct bearing on the junior Senator from Nebraska, I should like to see a report and see what the committee has to say, and for that reason I should be glad, indeed, to have the resolution agreed to.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one observation?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I again say, Mr. President, that I shall not change the attitude I have adopted since I became a member of the subcommittee, and that attitude, very briefly, is that the Senator from Connecticut has been trying to do his duty to the Senate and to the country, and so has the chairman of the subcommittee. I think the cartoon which I have described is a complete answer to the Senator from Nebraska.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Martin
Benton	Hickenlooper	Maybank
Brewster	Hill	Millikin
Bricker	Holland	Mundt

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. TAYLOR], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] is absent on official business as a member of the Committee on Armed Services.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HOEY], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. GRAHAM], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] are absent on public business.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business, attending the sessions of the International Labor Organization at Geneva, Switzerland, as a delegate representing the United States.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. JENNER] are necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

AMENDMENT OF HATCH ACT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTENTION TO CONSIDER CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I wish to announce that at 3 o'clock or a little thereafter this afternoon I intend to ask the Senate to consider the conference report on the bill to amend the Hatch Act. I think it will be generally agreeable to Senators to consider it at that time.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. It is agreeable to have the report considered at that time. The matter has been worked out between the majority and the minority leadership. I am glad the Senator from Arizona has made the announcement that he will ask to have the report considered this afternoon at the time he suggested.

At this time, Mr. President, I wish to ask the distinguished acting majority leader, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND], if he knows whether it is the intention of the majority leader to have a call of the calendar tomorrow? Yesterday the majority leader said he thought that would be done. Does the Senator know whether it will be done?

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, an announcement with respect thereto will be made shortly.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be transaction of the usual routine business at this time, without speeches or debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STORY OF AVIATION—UTILIZATION OF UNFINISHED PORTION OF HISTORICAL FRIEZE IN ROTUNDA OF CAPITOL

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 21) to provide for the utilization of a part of the unfinished portion of the historical frieze in the rotunda of the Capitol to portray the story of aviation, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HAYDEN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President apointed Mr. GREEN, Mr. STENNIS, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONVEYANCE OF FORT RUCKMAN MILITARY RESERVATION TO TOWN OF NAHANT, MASS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7477) providing for the conveyance to the town of Nahant, Mass., of the Fort Ruckman Military Reservation, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. BENTON, and Mrs. SMITH of Maine conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDINGS TO FACILITATE ADMINISTRATION IN NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AREAS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the act of August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 417, 444), to authorize the erection of buildings and structures to facilitate administration and to accommodate the public in National Capital Park areas in the District of Columbia (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Works.

DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, $130,000 for the purposes specified in section 124 of Public Law 472, Eightieth Congress, as amended.

THE SECURITY PROGRAM OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT—REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, Senators will recall that last February 22 the Senate adopted a resolution with relation to alleged disloyalty among employees of the State Department. The Committee on Foreign Relations appointed a subcommittee of five, and that subcommittee of five later appointed a subcommittee of two, to investigate and make a report on the organization of the State Department with reference to security. The members of the latter subcommittee were the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the senior Senator from Rhode Island, myself.

We have completed and filed with the subcommittee of five our report, and, with the approval of the chairman of the subcommittee, I ask that our report be printed in the body of the RECORD for the benefit of all Senators.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, UNITED STATES SENATE—SUBCOMMITTEE OF FIVE APPOINTED TO INVESTIGATE ALLEGED DISLOYALTY IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE—SUBCOMMITTEE OF TWO OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF FIVE APPOINTED TO STUDY AND REPORT ON THE PROVISIONS FOR SECURITY MADE IN THE DIVISION OF SECURITY OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE

FINAL REPORT OF THE SUBCOMMITTEE OF TWO

(On February 22, 1950, the Senate unanimously adopted Senate Resolution No. 231 authorizing the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to conduct a full and complete study and investigation of disloyalty on the part of persons who are or have been employed by the Department of State. The Foreign Relations Committee thereupon named a subcommittee of five to carry out the investigation provided for in the resolution. In this connection, it became desirable to investigate the State Department's arrangements for guarding against such disloyalty both as regards candidates for admission to the service and recurrent investigations during the term of service. The subcommittee of five left this latter study to a subcommittee of two consisting of Senator GREEN and Senator LODGE, which was appointed on April 24 with the specific purpose of investigating the practical operations, enforcement and day-to-day policing of the security program. What follows herewith is the report of the subcommittee of two to the subcommittee of five.)

In the United States, physical and personnel security for the Department of State is entrusted to the Division of Security, which is part of the Office of Consular Affairs, which in turn comes under the Deputy Under Secretary of State for Administration. Serving under Mr. Donald L. Nicholson, Chief of the Division of Security, are the Chiefs of four distinct branches: the Investigations Branch, the Evaluation Branch, the Foreign Service and Domestic Security Branch, and the Administrative Branch.

The investigations branch has 20 field offices throughout the United States. The largest are in Washington, D. C., and in New York City, with smaller field offices located in Atlanta, Ga.; Boston, Mass.; Chicago, Ill.; Cincinnati, Ohio; Dallas, Tex.; Denver, Colo.; Detroit, Mich.; Greensboro, N. C.; Los Angeles, Calif.; Miami, Fla.; New Orleans, La.; Omaha, Nebr.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; St. Paul, Minn.; San Francisco, Calif.; and Seattle, Wash.

Beginning in July 1949, the State Department expanded its world-wide security organization and established the present security system abroad. It set up six regional security headquarters heading up six regions which cover the 275 United States foreign service posts throughout the world. Broadly speaking, while under this system security remains the direct responsibility of every chief of mission, it is specifically carried out by the post security officer responsible for security in that diplomatic or consular post where he is stationed. Acting in an advisory capacity for all the post security officers in all the posts in their regions, are the regional security officers who are highly trained professionals.

It thus became important for the subcommittee of two to hear witnesses at four central points at which it would examine in person groups of security officers from different parts of the world as to actual operations and possible improvements. This required less expenditure of time, trouble, and money both for the State Department employees and for the subcommittee. The places selected for these investigations were Washington, Frankfurt, Paris, and New York. For the same reasons, the subcommittee of two did not take along either their staff or other persons, but relied on those available locally. On their flights to Europe and return, they used regular trips of Government planes. So there was thus no added cost to the Government. The total elapsed time away from the United States was 11 days.

The subcommittee of two interviewed both regional and post security officers from region I, the headquarters of which is in London and which includes all of Europe excepting Germany and Austria; and from region II, the headquarters of which is in Cairo and which includes all of the Near East and Africa; and from region VI, the headquarters of which is in Frankfurt and which covers all of western Germany. Of the forty-five professionally trained security officers throughout the world, 12 are in region I, 5 in region II, and 5 are in region VI, or about one-half of the total.

All testimony was taken in executive session on the express understanding that it would be read only by members of the subcommittee of five and that it would be termed "confidential." The subcommittee of two conducted 2 days of hearings in Washington on May 8 and 9, 3 days of hearings in Frankfurt, Germany, on May 25, 26, and 29, 3 days of hearings in Paris, France, on May 30, 31, and June 1, and 1 day of hearing in New York City on June 9. The following men were heard in the following places:

Washington

Samuel D. Boykin, Director, Office of Consular Affairs.

Donald L. Nicholson, Chief, Division of Security.

Travis L. Fletcher, Chief of Investigations Branch, Division of Security.

Joseph W. Amshey, Chief of Evaluations Branch, Division of Security.

Merrill M. Blevins, Chief of Foreign Service and Domestic Security Branch, Division of Security.

James S. Regan, Chief of Administrative Branch, Division of Security.

William L. Franklin, Special Agent in Charge, Washington Field Office, Division of Security.

John R. Hall, special agent, Washington Field Office, Division of Security.

Michael J. Ambrose, special agent, Washington Field Office, Division of Security.

Robert L. Redding, special agent, Washington Field Office, Division of Security.

Frankfurt

Rollie H. White, regional security supervisor, Cairo, Egypt.

Harry Hartup Deakyne, regional security officer, Cairo, Egypt.

John MacEwenn Betts, regional security officer, Athens, Greece.

John Patrick Mulligan, regional security officer, Cairo, Egypt.

Jack Blanchard Minor, regional security supervisor, Frankfurt, Germany.

John Francis Rieger, regional security officer, Frankfurt, Germany.

Paul Newland, regional security officer, Frankfurt, Germany.

Ronald A. Gaiduk, regional security officer, Frankfurt, Germany.

Glenn G. Wolfe, Director of Administration, Office of United States High Commissioner for Germany.

Paris

Joseph J. Bezjian, regional security officer, London, England.

William Bertrand Hussey, regional security supervisor, region I (Europe).

Herschel Hancock Helm, Jr., regional security officer, region I (Europe).

Charles McClean Johnston, regional security officer, region I (Europe).

Neil Carney McManus, regional security officer, region I (Europe).

Stanley G. Mattern, post security officer, London, England.

Paul H. Green, regional security officer, region I (Europe).

Gerard J. Rothlein, assistant attaché, United States Embassy, London, England.

Jack Arnold Herfurt, post security officer, Paris France.

New York

Rollan D. Clark, Special Agent in Charge, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

G. L. Lineberry, special agent, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

John O'Hanley, special agent, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

Peter de Pasqua, special agent, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

George M. Spoth, special agent, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

Richard C. Sabra, special agent, New York Field Office, Division of Security.

The above security officers who testified before the subcommittee of two made a uniformly good impression and gave every indication of being alert, capable, and well-trained men who had a thorough grasp of their subject. The verbatim record of their testimony is submitted with this report and, as stated before, must be termed "confidential." The subcommittee drew from it the following conclusions:

CONCLUSIONS

1. The security of the United States abroad depends on physical, as well as upon personnel factors. Taking physical security first, it is to be noted that a survey of physical security of all buildings at posts abroad is already under way. It should, however, be hastened. For security reasons, it is desirable that the United States should own rather than lease its buildings abroad. This is in order that special construction can be undertaken to provide a high degree of security for such sensitive areas as the code and cryptographic rooms. It was reported, for example, that the buildings housing American activities in certain posts are at the present time unsatisfactory from a security standpoint. At posts in the tropics, the installation of air-conditioning greatly increases the security of a building because it makes it possible to keep the windows closed in rooms where there is specialized equipment. In only two major centers in Germany—Frankfurt and Berlin—out of 11 in the American Zone, has a basic physical security survey been made, and in neither of these two places would it appear as of May 30 that all reasonable physical security precautions had yet been taken. Even in Frankfurt where arrangements are supposed to be complete, further steps should still be taken. In region I, 43 out of the 78 posts have had a basic physical security survey, but none of the recommendations have been carried out to date. With the present personnel force in region I, it will require 6 months more to complete the basic physical security check. The addition of four more security officers would shorten the time by one or two months. This should be made. Physical security would also be enhanced by getting all American activities in each city into one building.

2. There has been progress in the general art of listening devices, and there is no reason to suppose that the United States is surpassed in the development of these devices. The fact that microphones have been made which have very little metal in them makes it more difficult than ever to detect them.

3. There was unanimous agreement among all the witnesses that all aliens now employed in American embassies, consulates and legations abroad should be replaced as rapidly as possible by Americans. There was no evidence that any other nation had so large a proportion as the United States of alien employees. Out of 3,000 aliens employed by the United States throughout the world outside of Germany and Austria, about 15 percent to 20 percent are engaged in actual clerical work, the rest being drivers, janitors, charwomen, elevator operators, telephone operators, etc.

In the Embassy in Paris, 50 percent of the employees are aliens. In many instances, aliens have access to classified material and these aliens often have not had a full field investigation. Clearly the alien clerical employees should be eliminated first. Aliens are the most likely means of foreign penetration and the effort to penetrate our security abroad is constantly growing. Although some aliens do undoubtedly like America, aliens as a rule cannot be counted upon to feel loyalty to the United States. The low salaries which the aliens are paid make them a prey to bribery and to pressure. It is also hard to investigate the background of aliens, and as a general rule there are not enough security officers to carry on surveillance.

In Germany alone, 10,000 aliens are employed by the United States, of whom 2,000 do clerical work. The screening of these aliens began last April 1 and as of May 1 only 100 had been definitely screened. It is believed that it will take 4 to 6 months more to screen the rest. Provisions should be made to hasten this result. At the time that they were originally hired by Military Government, 15 percent of these aliens had never been screened at all. Out of the 1,000 aliens who had so far been screened, 100 had been separated from the service. There are a number of officers in the American headquarters in Berlin, such as the Office of Labor Affairs and the Office of Political Affairs, where there are no American secretaries at all, and where they are urgently needed because of the presence of highly classified material.

The Soviet establishment abroad, on the other hand, are so far as is known, completely staffed by Russians. Recently a Russian employee in London required a serious emergency operation, but he was not allowed to be operated upon in London for fear he might talk while under the anesthetic. So he was flown back to Russia at the risk of his life.

4. Clearly there should be a professional full-time security officer in every major post. By professional is meant one who, having completed a full college course, has had successful practical experience in security matters. In every capital behind the iron curtain, for example, and in some other capitals, there are no such full-time officers in important posts, for example in Moscow, Vienna, Stockholm, Warsaw, Prague, Budapest, and Bucharest. As the system is now constituted, the great majority of posts have the services of professional security officers only when they are visited by the regional security officer, and this is supposed to take place once every 4 months, although actually it happens less often. This means that the initial investigation of disloyalty in any individual case depends on the local post security officer—and he is usually not a professional investigator. In the 275 foreign service posts throughout the world, there are only 10 full-time professional security officers. This is too small a number.

5. Every part-time post security officer should be trained in Washington before going abroad instead of depending solely on the instruction which he receives from the regional security officer after arrival.

6. Careful study should be given to providing a system whereby the Department will be kept informed of any recommendations which any security officer may make for the improvement of the service. At present such recommendations may be made to Chiefs of Missions, but the State Department be uninformed of them. Under the present system most posts have a nonprofessional security officer who has security responsibility in addition to his other duties. Study should be given to changing this arrangement to one in which the work of post security is done by a professional security man who may perform nonsecurity work in addition to his other duties, and not vice versa.

7. It would be advantageous to have precise instruction in the form of a well-organized course in Communist techniques given to all security officers before they leave the United States. They all will learn about the brutal facts of communism sooner or later anyway, and it would save time for them to get their information earlier in a concentrated and authoritative form. The training of all security officers should be more standardized than is now the case.

8. The system of having marines guarding American embassies and legations has worked out extremely well, and the unanimous testimony indicates that for all civilian guards additional Marines should be substituted. It is estimated that to accomplish this, 200 more marines would be required. Testimony shows that in Germany charwomen have access to virtually all rooms in the American headquarters, that they are not required to keep doors open while cleaning, and that they are not watched while working either by American or German guards.

9. In many instances alien servants and drivers of American officials are not screened. This offers a very dangerous opportunity for espionage.

10. There should be more professional security officers on a regional basis so that more frequent investigations of posts may be made. In region II, the area that is covered by the Cairo office, testimony indicates two more security officers are needed. Region I, it is believed, needs three to four more security officers. In Germany there are now four full-time security officers, but it is believed that at least two more are necessary. It is noteworthy that the man who is now charged with security in Berlin does not actually come under the Security Division and gives only 80 percent of his time to the work. It seems that here is a sensitive place which is certainly entitled to the services of a full-time man and one who is clearly under the Security Chief. At present the fact that there are only four security officers in Germany means that it will take 8 to 10 months more to finish the building survey. A staff of seven could finish the work in 4 to 6 months. This time is worth saving at this critical juncture.

11. As one illustration of the growing awareness of the importance of security, it may be noted that in Germany since December 1, 1949, about 50 out of a total of about 2,000 American employees have been dismissed for various security reasons. Security officers report hearty cooperation in most cases on the part of the chiefs of missions. This appreciation of the importance of security, however, is still lacking in some of the high-level positions. The testimony indicated that frequently there was less difficulty in keeping security in junior grades than among high officials.

12. There must be a rule of reason in these matters and security might be carried to a point where it hampers efficiency. A tendency was reported to classify documents much higher than is warranted by the importance of their confidential character.

13. The workload in the Washington and New York offices is too heavy and there should be a larger force in both places.

14. At present the security of the State Department is handled by the Division of Security which is a part of the Office of Consular Affairs, which in turn is under the Deputy Under Secretary of State, who is in turn under the Secretary of State. It appears to this subcommittee that the title "Office of Consular Affairs" is not only misleading but relegates security to a minor post, when nowadays it should hold a more important place. It is recommended that the echelon which now exists between the Division of Security and the Deputy Under Secretary of State be eliminated. Thus, the Chief of Security would come directly under the Deputy Under Secretary of State, and in view of the increasing importance of security this is where he belongs. Security will thus get the benefit of first-hand encouragement from the top and the high officials will have more first-hand contact with security than is now the case.

15. Apart from the conclusions stated above, this committee has no present recommendations to make for the improvement of the existing security plan or of its administration.

Respectfully submitted.

THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN,
Chairman.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. NEELY (for Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina), from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred for examination and recommendation three lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HILL:

S. 3773. A bill for the relief of Midori Naito; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KILGORE:

S. 3774. A bill for the relief of Stephen A. Spilios; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. THOMAS of Utah (for himself and Mr. IVES) introduced Senate bill 3775, to provide for the establishing of congressional investigating commissions, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. NEELY:

S. 3776. A bill to amend and extend the provisions of the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as amended; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. THYE:

S. 3777. A bill for the relief of Valdeko Kangro; and

S. 3778. A bill for the relief of Kaljo Raid; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BENTON:

S. 3779. A bill to authorize the issuance of a special series of stamps commemorative of the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the town of New Britain, Conn.; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

(Mr. MUNDT introduced Senate bill 3780, to establish a Commission on Cooperative International Relations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and appears under a separate heading.)

(Mr. McCLELLAN introduced Senate bill 3781, to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and appears under a separate heading.)

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL PROPERTY AND ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES ACT OF 1949

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the bill which I have prepared be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanatory statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3781) to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. McCLELLAN, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. McCLELLAN is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR McCLELLAN

Mr. President, I am introducing a bill to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949. This proposal was drafted by the General Services Administration in collaboration with the Bureau of the Budget, the staff of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and the legislative counsel of the Senate, and is intended to accomplish the following objectives:

(a) To clarify existing provisions of law and to provide more flexibility in the administration of the various programs administered by the General Services Administration.

(b) To authorize the donation of surplus personal property to State-controlled public health, hospitals and medical institutions in the same manner as such property is allocated to public schools for educational use.

(c) To provide enabling legislation authorizing the performance of certain supply services which have been carried on under authority contained in the annual appropriation acts.

(d) To further amend the National Archives Act of 1934, and to establish an orderly method of control, storage, and disposition of Government records, the establishment and maintenance of record centers, preservation of personal papers of the President, and the heads of executive departments, if and when it is determined that such papers are of historical importance or should be retained for posterity.

(e) To provide necessary administrative controls over Federal buildings management functions transferred to the General Services Administration under Reorganization Plan No. 18 of 1950.

Mr. President, this amendment has been analyzed by the staff of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments; it was compared with a similar measure introduced in the House of Representatives, and after consultation with the Bureau of the Budget and agency representatives, I believe that this amendment is essential and necessary to perfect the organization of the GSA, and shall endeavor to have it considered by the committee so that it can be presented to the Congress for action at this session in the form finally approved by the committee.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 22 OF 1950

Mr. GEORGE (for himself and Mr. CAIN) submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 299), which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

Resolved, That the Senate does not favor the Reorganization Plan No. 22 transmitted to Congress by the President on May 9, 1950.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GEORGE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. KILGORE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 6000, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950—AMENDMENTS

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, and deals with the payment of Federal grants to States for pensions to the blind, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the amendment prepared by me may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the explanatory statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. MYERS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS ON INTRODUCING BLIND PENSION AMENDMENT TO THE SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Mr. President, I intend to submit an amendment to the pending social security bill, H. R. 6000. My amendment deals with the payment of Federal grants to States for pensions to the blind.

I am proud to say, Mr. President, that the State of Pennsylvania operates what many regard as the most enlightened blind pension system provided by any State in the country. The Pennsylvania plan—which has been in effect for about 15 years—is now financed exclusively by State funds. Not 1 penny of Federal money has gone to Pennsylvania for the payment of our pensions to the blind since 1938.

When we stop to consider that millions of dollars in Federal grants have gone out to other States to assist them in paying for blind pensions, I think it is most worth while to look into the reasons why Pennsylvania does not receive any Federal assistance for the operation of our blind pension system.

There is only one reason, Mr. President. Pennsylvania has established more liberal eligibility standards than those set forth under existing Federal legislation for grants to States for blind pensions. Thus, Pennsylvania has been denied any help from the Federal Government merely because Pennsylvania has chosen to be more generous than other States.

I do not think this is fair.

Under existing Federal legislation, grants for blind pensions are available only to States whose plans are limited in their operation to those blind people who meet a most stringent needs test. In other words, if a State wishes to establish a more liberal test of eligibility for its needy blind, the State is forced to support its entire program for the blind exclusively with its own funds.

I am happy to observe at this point that the present social-security bill liberalizes the needs test for the blind. But the changes recommended by the Senate Finance Committee are still not as liberal as those provided for eligibility under the Pennsylvania plan.

Now, Mr. President, I believe there is a perfectly straightforward solution to this difficulty. The solution is recognized in part by the action of the Senate Finance Committee in a committee amendment to the House bill—an amendment which will permit the administrator of the Federal program to approve grants to Pennsylvania and to the State of Missouri (which is in a comparable situation). This committee amendment would permit the use of Federal contributions for pensions going to persons whose incomes conform to the needs test under the Federal law. The committee amendment would further permit the State to provide other programs, financed entirely by the State, for those blind persons whose incomes are above the levels of the needs test set forth in the pending bill.

The committee proposal, however, would approve the plans of Missouri and Pennsylvania only until July 1, 1953, on the theory that the two States would thereafter be required to bring their entire pension systems into line with the minimum needs test of the Federal law—or would otherwise be required to support their blind-pension systems entirely with their own funds.

This date line of July 1, 1953, Mr. President, would merely force Pennsylvania back into precisely the position it is in at the present time. The State would have the alternative of abandoning its liberal system in order to get any further Federal aid—or, on the other hand, the State would be forced to return to the present method under which our program of assistance to the blind is supported without any Federal assistance.

To me, Mr. President, it is unjust indeed that a State should be penalized for operating a more liberal pension system than that set forth under Federal standards. I see no reason under the sun why Missouri, and Pennsylvania—and any other State for that matter, should not be permitted to conduct additional State programs for the blind which do not conflict with the operation of the Federal program. In this fashion, the Federal funds could go to the State for assistance in pensions for those blind persons who meet the needs test under the Federal law. At the same time—and these States cannot do this at the present time—the State would be free to operate its own system, entirely State supported, which provides pensions under a more liberal needs test.

My amendment, Mr. President, would make such an arrangement permanently possible in such States as Missouri and Pennsylvania. It would do so by the simple expedient of striking the terminal date of July 1, 1953, from the committee proposal I have already referred to.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to make it clear that my amendment will not mean that Missouri and Pennsylvania will receive more than their share under this Federal-grant program; in each instance, the grants will be limited to assistance in paying pensions only to those who meet the Federal needs test, just as is done in all the other States. But, on the other hand, the States will be permitted to carry out their own more liberal programs for the blind—provided they are willing to do so with their own funds.

So, Mr. President, I urge the Members of the Senate to give this amendment the most careful consideration, because I believe in justice to the liberal legislation now in effect in Missouri—and which has been in effect in Pennsylvania since 1935—that this change should be made.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I also submit amendments intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, relating to residence requirement of 1 year as condition of eligibility in aid to the blind, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the amendment prepared by me be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement presented by Mr. MYERS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS ON INTRODUCING AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE MAXIMUM RESIDENCE REQUIREMENT OF 1 YEAR AS CONDITION OF ELIGIBILITY IN AID TO BLIND

Mr. President, I am submitting a further amendment in connection with Federal grants to States for aid to the blind. My amendment seeks to restore a provision adopted by the House in passing H. R. 6000.

The substance of the House provision—and of my amendment—deals with the length of time a needy blind person must reside in a State in order to qualify for assistance. The provision adopted by the House established 1 year as a maximum period of residence necessary for eligibility.

This alters the present law under which a State may receive Federal aid, although requiring up to 5 years of residence as a condition of eligibility.

I might point out that the Advisory Council recommended that a State should not be permitted to impose any residence requirement, and had this to say:

"Residence and settlement laws result in unwarranted hardship for needy persons, not only because these laws are sometimes invoked by welfare administrators for the purpose of shipping back needy persons to the communities where they belong, but also because persons often lose their residence and settlement in the State in which they once had such status before they can acquire it in another. They belong nowhere under the statutes of the respective States.

"In our society, mobility of population is essential. Individuals should be free to move where jobs are available, and if, as a result of illness or other misfortune, they become needy, they should not be denied assistance because they have crossed State or county lines. We believe that residence and settlement provisions are socially unjustifiable."

In view of the fact that a majority of the States have eligibility requirements of a year or less, I believe my amendment is consistent with our general thinking and that this change will bring about a more just provision for aid to our needy blind citizens.

My amendment, therefore, would amend title X, effective July 1, 1951, to preclude approval of any plan for aid to the blind which imposes as a condition of eligibility a residence requirement of more than 1 year of continuous residence in a State prior to the date of application. It provides, however, that a State may impose, until July 1, 1951, any residence requirement which is not in excess of that contained on July 1, 1950, in its State plan approved on or prior to such date.

CHANGE OF STATUS OF BOULDER CITY, NEV., TO A STATE MUNICIPALITY

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have before me a report on Boulder City, Nev., which has been prepared by Dr. Henry Reining, professor of public administration and political science at the University of Southern California.

For some time, Mr. President, the citizens of Boulder City have been concerned with growing municipal problems which affect their welfare and interest. They, like the residents of the District of Columbia, live in a Federal municipality. A considerable number of these citizens have expressed to me their desire to have their fair city become a State municipality, so that they might more adequately participate in its administration.

Boulder City is the operating headquarters for Hoover Dam and the Lake Mead recreational area, as well as being the regional headquarters of the Bureau of Reclamation. The city was first established as a construction camp, and later became a model city. Its growth has been phenomenal, and it still continues to grow.

After many conferences and meetings with the citizens and civic groups, I concluded that if this problem was ever to be resolved, a survey would have to be made. In order that such a survey would not have imputed to it any charge of prejudice, I insisted that the person chosen to make the survey should be someone outside of Government, but a person skilled in city government. After canvassing the field, the Department of the Interior appointed Dr. Reining, who admirably met the necessary standards of skill and impartiality.

Prior to Dr. Reining's going to Boulder City, I held many conferences with him in order that the problems to be studied would receive the proper attention. In addition, he studied the problems now faced by other Federal cities.

Dr. Reining then went to Boulder City and held extensive hearings. Everyone was encouraged to testify. In addition, he made a thorough and complete study of all problems involved in the proposal to change Boulder City from a Federal to a State municipality. The results of these hearings and studies, as well as recommendations for a solution, are contained in the report which I have before me.

From the beginning, Mr. President, I have been very insistent that no steps be taken to change the status of Boulder City, unless and until the citizens of that community have an opportunity to express themselves in an election as to which type of municipality they would favor.

In order that they may be informed and will have the necessary data upon which to base their decision, I request that Dr. Reining's report be printed as a Senate document. I therefore request that this report be referred to the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, and urge favorable consideration by it of this request.

In closing, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that this report is not only important in relation to Boulder City, but is so thorough and extensive that it will be of material assistance in the solution of problems now facing other Federal municipalities in other sections of the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report and the request to have it printed as a Senate document will be referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

The following reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Martin A. Hutchinson, of Virginia, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner for the unexpired term of 7 years from September 26, 1946, vice Ewin Lamar Davis, deceased; adversely.

By Mr. TOBEY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

Nelson Lee Smith, of New Hampshire, to be a member of the Federal Power Commission for the term expiring June 22, 1955 (reappointment); favorably.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR KNOWLAND AT THE CONNECTICUT REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION

[Mr. KNOWLAND asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by him at the Connecticut Republican State Convention, New Haven, Conn., on June 14, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

FLAG DAY ADDRESS BY SENATOR KEM

ONE HUNDRED YEARS' PROGRESS IN AGRICULTURE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR ELLENDER

ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR DEWEY AT ANNUAL DAIRYMEN'S DINNER

[Mr. IVES asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Governor Dewey at the Annual Dairymen's Dinner, held under the auspices of the Jefferson County Farm Bureau Federation, Watertown, N. Y., June 12, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

END OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN THE ARMED SERVICES—ARTICLE BY E. W. KENWORTHY

[Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Taps for Jim Crow in the Services," by E. W. Kenworthy, published in the New York Times of June 11, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

RACIAL DISCRIMINATION — ARTICLE FROM THE PORTLAND (MAINE) EVENING EXPRESS

[Mr. MAYBANK asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Who Knows Best?" from the Portland (Maine) Evening Express, which appears in the Appendix.]

[Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a statement entitled "For a Prosperous New England," distributed at a breakfast this morning by the six New England CIO councils for New England's Congressional Representatives, which appears in the Appendix.]

BASING POINT LEGISLATION—LETTER BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY AND ARTICLE BY MARQUIS CHILDS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in the Washington Post this morning there appeared a letter to the editor which I ventured to write with respect to the bill, S. 1008, which is now awaiting the action of the President at the White House, having been passed by both Houses of the Congress. This letter of mine was written after I had read a column written by my friend, Marquis Childs, published in the Post of Tuesday morning.

I ask unanimous consent that my letter may be printed in the body of the RECORD, inasmuch as it deals with a matter of legislation which is still in the process prescribed by the Constitution.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COMMUNICATION—O'MAHONEY DEFENDS HIS COMPETITION BILL

(By JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, Senator from Wyoming)

They call my bill, S. 1008, the basing-point bill, thus giving a good dog a bad name. Everybody knows what happens to a good dog when a sufficient number of people in any community give credence to the bad name. It should not happen to this dog, for S. 1008 is a good bill which will be good for business and good for competition and will not weaken the antitrust laws.

Marquis Childs, in his column in the Washington Post of June 13, says:

"The measure, passed by the Senate by a vote of 43 to 27, permits manufacturers to fix a base price that includes the freight charges from a given point, usually the city in which the major part of the industry is concentrated. Thus, all buyers must pay the same price whether they are 2,000 miles away or right next door to the factory."

If the bill did that I would be opposed to it because it would then legalize price-fixing by restablishing the outlawed Pittsburg-plus system. Frankly, it is impossible for me to understand how any person who has read the bill can draw such a conclusion. This is what the bill says:

"It shall not be an unfair method of competition or an unfair or deceptive act or practice for a seller, acting independently, to quote or sell at delivered prices or to absorb freight."

This language is merely a restatement of what has been testified by the Federal Trade Commisison. Observe the words "acting independently." How can a seller, acting independently, participate in an industry-wide agreement, express or implied, that would select the city in which the major part of the industry is concentrated and fix identical prices with all competitors on that basis? To me independent action means independent action, but in order that there might be no doubt whatsoever on this point there was written into my bill, following the sentence above quoted, the following proviso:

"Provided, That this shall not make lawful any combination, conspiracy, or collusive agreement; or any monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practice, carried out by or involving the use of delivered prices or freight absorption."

This language cannot be misunderstood by any person who is willing to give simple words their plain meaning. It says that neither of these pricing practices can be even involved in any combination, conspiracy or collusive agreement. Surely that outlaws any such understanding as well as any such written agreement. But the proviso goes further. It says that the practices cannot be involved in any monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practice. Thus the individual seller, acting alone, cannot on his own behalf by fraud, by deception, by oppression or monopolistic action use either delivered prices or absorb freight.

This section appears in the bill on the President's desk exactly as it was passed by the Senate on June 1, 1949. It was not amended in the House, it was not touched in the conference and the whole contention that this bill legalizes the systematic basing-point system arises from fears which have no substance.

Opponents of the bill who were not concerned about the provisions of section I, above quoted, have opposed it because they allege that it undermines the Robinson-Patman Act. They are equally mistaken. The Robinson-Patman Act makes it "unlawful for any person engaged in commerce * * * to discriminate in price * * * where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce or to injure, destroy or prevent competition." This provision of the Robinson-Patman Act is not altered in one iota by my bill, for any price discrimination the effect of which may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly will be as firmly forbidden if the President signs this bill as it is now because my bill does not amend the provision of the Robinson-Patman Act which describes the unlawful act.

It is so carefully drawn that it provides for the protection of delivered pricing only when its effect is not that prohibited by the Robinson-Patman Act. Likewise with respect to freight absorption, it provides that this practice is protected only where its effect is such that it would not be prohibited by the Robinson-Patman Act.

There is, however, another attack upon the bill which is made by those who do not want too much competition in the retail field. They would prefer a system of price freezing rather than price competition and they say that a seller who, in good faith, reduces a price to meet the price of a competitor, should by that fact alone be required to prove his innocence even through the Government was unable to show that the effect of the reduction might be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly.

Either we are for competition or we are against it. I am for competition. I believe that the consumer is entitled to consideration and it seems to me to be utterly fantastic that people who believe themselves to be foes of monopoly should, in one breath, condemn this bill on the baseless charge that in section 1 it would permit price fixing and then condemn it on the charge that in section 3 it would not permit price fixing on the retail level.

I say here, as I said upon the Senate floor, that this bill is good for business and good for small business; that it preserves competition by eliminating confusion as to the meaning of the law; that it does not undermine the antitrust laws. It does not legalize the basing-point system. It does not undermine the Robinson-Patman Act. Government owes a responsibility to the commerce which it must regulate in the public interest to protect competition by making the law clear.

WASHINGTON.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I request also that the column of Mr. Marquis Childs to which my letter was a response may be printed immediately following the letter.

There being no objection, the column was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BASING POINT PERPLEXITY

(By Marquis Childs)

WHETHER TO VETO

Once again a struggle is being waged around the White House over an economic issue that casts a much longer shadow than is generally realized. Once more the telegrams and letters are raining down on the President, who must, when all the memoranda are written and the arguments reviewed, make the final decision.

This time it is the basing point bill which Mr. Truman must sign or veto. It involves a kind of economics so complicated that it has been almost entirely ignored in the press.

The measure, passed by the Senate by a vote of 43 to 27, permits manufacturers to fix a base price that includes the freight charges from a given point, usually the city in which the major part of the industry is concentrated. Thus all buyers must pay the same price whether they are 2,000 miles away or right next door to the factory.

Those in favor of legalizing the basing-point system say that all the bill does is approve a practice already widespread in industry, and thereby it ends legal and other confusions. Most respectable and seemingly disinterested proponent of the bill is Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, of Wyoming. O'MAHONEY has through most of his long congressional career fought the trusts and the rise of monopoly concentration and gigantism in finance and industry. Before World War II he headed the joint Senate-House committee that dug deep into the structure of American business.

On the other side are most of the Democrats who follow the trust-busting line. They have argued long and with thorough and skillful documentation that such a measure would destroy price competition and shoot the antitrust laws full of holes. It seems to me hard to refute these arguments unless you simply admit that price competition is in effect eliminated over wide areas anyway and so why not regularize it and end the uncertainty that business lives under today.

The opposition takes on an interesting geographical coloration. Senators from the South and West who want to attract industry and end the levy of the freight rates that keeps their States in a semicolonial status lined up against bigness and the theory of inevitable concentration in the East.

One of the active opponents of the measure was Senator RUSSELL LONG, of Louisiana. In young LONG's arguments were many echoes of his father, the late Huey, who fought with fiery effectiveness against the big, wicked corporations that were squeezing the poor folk back in the canebrakes. One of the most effective speeches against the basing-point system was made by Senator LISTER HILL, of Alabama.

Senator ESTES KEFAUVER of Tennessee also did a thorough job on the opposition side. As in the fight on the Kerr natural gas bill, Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, of Illinois, carried a heavy load, and so did Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota.

The economic issue on the basing-point bill is nothing like as clear and simple as it was with respect to the Kerr bill. The same opposition, with the exception of many of the southerners, declared that passage of the Kerr bill would mean an increase in the gas bills in millions of households in northern cities. Senator KERR and his allies could and did deny this, but they could not guarantee that it would not happen.

During the period when the same kind of pulling and hauling was going on over the Kerr bill, the predictions were that the President would in the show-down sign it. Those predictions were wrong, although it appears that only as the result of a last-minute change of heart did the President finally arrive at a veto.

This time the advance indications are for a veto, and they could be just as wrong as in the other instance. The same groups that opposed the Kerr bill are now urging the President to turn down the basing-point measure. Among them are the trade-unions, farm organizations, and some small business associations. They have thus far produced a volume of protest much greater than the favorable mail and telegrams.

But there are influential advocates who want Mr. Truman to sign. One of them is Secretary of Commerce Charles Sawyer. And the fact that O'MAHONEY is for the bill can hardly be ignored.

That ancient story about the farm hand who did fine at every kind of hard and demanding task until he was put to sorting the good potatoes from the bad may apply to the job of President. It's the decisions that really get you down. And the President's own party is so split that he can't ordinarily fall back on party regularity. But in this case most of the Democrats, certainly the Truman Democrats, are on the opposition side.

PROPOSED CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATING COMMISSIONS ACT

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, the time has come, and is even past, when the Congress must reassert in unequivocal manner to the American people its capacity to fulfill its inherent and fitting function of carrying out the will of the people it represents. I hasten to add that I fully believe it always has done this, but occasions do arise when doubt exist in the minds of many people as to the ability of Congress so to function. These are times when no such doubts should be permitted to exist, and it is within our power completely to eliminate these doubts through orderly congressional procedures. It is to that subject that I wish to devote these few remarks in connection with the proposal the Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] and myself offer today in the form of a bill which we are introducing.

I want to commend the junior Senator from Maine [Mrs. SMITH] for her remarks in this Chamber on June 1. Her words should be recognized as a symptom of the feelings of many thoughtful people in our great Nation. I wish to quote one sentence she spoke that day, and say I quite agree with her, at least in part. She said:

I think that it is high time for the United States Senate and its Members to do some real soul searching and to weigh our consciences as to the manner in which we are performing our duty to the people of America and the manner in which we are using or abusing our individual powers and privileges.

Some of our people would conclude from our colleague's remarks that the Congress has allowed some matters to get out of control. I do not think many Members of Congress actually share that conclusion; but because we, as Members of Congress, are responsible to the people who elected us, it is incumbent upon us to justify completely the faith and trust placed in our hands.

We have heard many criticisms, for example, of the subcommittee investigating Communists in the State Department. I, for one, do not join in such criticisms at this time. On the contrary, I have full confidence in the integrity and sincerity of purpose of all connected with that investigation. That committee, as in the case of any other similar committee, should be permitted to conduct its investigation and make its report before any judgments are handed down.

At the same time, the Congress and the people have a right to obtain—and must necessarily do so—all the facts in a given inquiry, so that the Congress can, in justice, act, if such action is required. It is further necessary that the development of such facts be done under congressional authority and auspices.

To the end that complete faith be given to the investigating body and its findings, such investigations embodying the grave nature of the Tydings investigation, for example, should be conducted with complete disregard for personal and party prejudice. This is a duty the Congress owes to the people of the United States.

To fulfill this duty of objective inquiry, it seems to me that we should no longer tolerate in these crucial days a defective system of searching into questions of grave public concern, such as the national security, for example. The Congress has continued to use such a system of majority party control of its investigating committees, a system which gives rise to doubts, suspicions, and misgivings in the minds of a large segment of the public as to the value and thoroughness of the committee's findings and report. This system is perfectly legitimate and proper for routine congressional organization, but I say it is unwise in these trying days to use it for the types of investigation contemplated under today's proposed bill. Party politics, bias, personal prejudices, and like attitudes have no place in such investigations. We are trying to eliminate these elements in the development of our foreign policy. It is just as important to eliminate them from investigations looking into matters of grave domestic concern.

There is an area where party and political interests have their legitimate place, but beyond that area there must be no such considerations. Where facts must be obtained as a prime requisite for developing means to protect the American way of life, nothing should be permitted to stand in the way of obtaining those facts or to risk losing the faith and trust of the American people in their Congress. Congress is the very citadel of the American system of government, and must continue to stand as one of its pillars. In recent years many events have occurred to weaken that pillar, and it is now urgently necessary to repair these damages. This bill can go a long way in performing that task.

I wish to make these introductory remarks as brief as possible, because all aspects of the proposal contained in the bill we are introducing can be explored and developed in the committee consideration. Therefore, an outline and brief analysis of the proposal should suffice today. Briefly, then, it is this:

The Legislative Reorganization Act, which I had much to do with bringing into being, was a long step forward in improving and increasing the efficiency and effectiveness of the functions of Congress. This proposal simply is another step in that direction and supplements, but does not interfere with, the Reorganization Act. It is designed to foster and encourage the faith and trust of the people in its Congress and in its investigative functions.

Mr. President, I have prepared an analysis of the proposed bill, which provides for a new and different way of carrying on investigations. I ask that the analysis be made a part of my remarks and be inserted at this place in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATING COMMISSIONS ACT INTRODUCED BY SENATOR THOMAS OF UTAH (FOR HIMSELF AND SENATOR IVES)

The first section of the bill provides a short title—"Congressional Investigating Commissions Act."

Section 2 provides for initiation of investigations of governmental administration and affairs or other matters of urgent public importance through the concurrent resolution method, similar to the method used to initiate investigations by the Federal Trade Commission, and provides that upon the passage of a concurrent resolution a congressional investigating commission shall be established.

Section 3 sets out the method of appointment of investigating commissions referred to above. The commissions are to be composed of seven members appointed as follows:

1. Two Senators appointed by the President of the Senate, one from each of the two major political parties;

2. Two Members of the House of Representatives appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, one from each of the two major political parties; and

3. Three members from a panel appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, these three panel members to be appointed jointly by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and not more than two to be from the same political party.

Section 4 provides that the chairman of each investigating commission shall be appointed jointly by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Section 5 provides that four members of a commission shall constitute a quorum, but provides that the commission may fix a lesser number as a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony.

Section 6 fixes the compensation of members of investigating commissions. Members of Congress serve without additional compensation but are reimbursed for expenses incurred in the performance of their duties. Members from private life receive $50 per diem when engaged in the performance of duties vested in the commission, plus reimbursement for expenses.

Section 7 authorizes each investigating commission to appoint and fix the compensation of necessary staff personnel, and excepts attorneys and experts from the application of penal statutes prohibiting Government employees from being interested in claims, proceedings, or matters involving the United States.

Section 8 provides that the expiration date of each investigating commission shall be fixed in the concurrent resolution initiating the investigation.

Section 9 gives each investigating commission affirmative power to make the investigation covered by the initiating concurrent resolution and requires it to report its findings and recommendations to the Congress.

Section 10 sets forth in detail the procedural powers of investigating commissions, which are similar to those of Federal regulatory commissions. Each commission has the power of subpena and in case of contumacy may invoke the aid of United States courts to enforce its subpenas. Subsection (d) of this section provides that a person may not refuse to testify or produce evidence on the ground of self-incrimination but gives him immunity from prosecution on account of any matter as to which he is compelled to testify or produce evidence, except that he is not exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury. Subsection (e) of this section will afford witnesses the same immunity from defamation suits as witnesses in the district courts of the United States.

Section 11 provides for payment of expenses of commissions one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I should say here also that I am not entirely unfamiliar and unacquainted with the investigatorial bodies which I am indirectly criticizing by introducing this bill. I served for a long time on certain of the committees which have adopted the practice, under the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, of having investigations conducted by subcommittees of the regular committee. I found that a great step forward was taken when we did that. But, Mr. President, some committees get out of hand, and it is to correct that situation and at the same time be fair to all people concerned, those being investigated as well as those who are conducting the investigation, and, above all, to be fair to the American people, that I have deemed it wise at least to put before the Congress and to put into the hands of the American people for their study, this scheme for bringing about a new way of conducting investigations such as those which are being carried on at the present time.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask that a memorandum with tables showing the amount of money spent by the past two Congresses for special investigations, and which has been prepared for me by Dr. George B. Galloway of the Legislative Reference Service, together with some other pertinent data on this subject, be inserted at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum, and the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM IN RELATION TO LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT OF 1946

The Senate has heretofore expressed itself on the general subject of special committees by its action in its original passage of the legislative reorganization act. Unfortunately, as a matter of parliamentary expediency, the provision in the Senate-passed version relative to such committees was dropped in the final version of the bill that was adopted. Various members of the Senate have since expressed themselves individually on the subject, and there seems to be widespread opinion in this body that procedures in setting up special committees since the reorganization is violative to the spirit of what the Senate had in mind at the time the act was being considered.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], on January 10, 1947 (p. 242, temp. ed.) stated thus:

"When it comes to the question of special committees we must decide what the policy will be, not as a party, but as the Senate of the United States. If it is to be the policy of the Senate that no special committees shall be organized, certainly I shall be glad to go along with that policy. I am just as anxious to eliminate them as is any other Senator."

The Senator from Nebraska also called attention to the fact that subjects would arise which would cross standing committee lines, and I agree with him. It is a vexing problem at such times, and under existing policy and procedures creating of a special committee appears to be the only manner of compromising the concern of members of interested standing committees. The bill which is being introduced today should lead to consideration improvement in procedure in such cases, while at the same time safeguarding the procedures already provided under the Legislative Reorganization Act. The experience of the Congress since the adoption of this reorganization act has demonstrated that notwithstanding the attempt to provide comprehensive coverage for the standing committees, special committees have had to be established to investigate various subjects and they are presently functioning. I have no quarrel with what has been done because that was the only thing that could have been done, apparently. It seems appropriate, at this time, to submit the following tables prepared by the Legislative Reference Service, showing just what the Congress has done during the Eightieth and the first session of the Eighty-first Congresses in authorizing special investigations. I therefore include these tables in my remarks at this point:

It is further appropriate to point out that additional duties imposed upon members through special committee work are unduly burdensome. It consequently lessens their real, potential effectiveness in the consideration of pending legislation, in that they simply do not have time to devote to it that otherwise they would have. For example, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is quoted in a news dispatch of May 18, 1950, as stating his duties as chairman of the committee investigating Communists in Government were impeding his responsibilities as chairman of the committee having jurisdiction over pending legislation affecting the national security. He is further quoted as saying that he would have to devote more time to his normal duties, obviously to the neglect to some degree of his special duties. Additional and special duties frequently result in scanty attendance on the floor of the chamber through no fault of the individual Member. The speeches and remarks of other Members thus must fall on empty spaces and are lost to other Members, even though the speeches and remarks are preserved in the RECORD, as Members do not have adequate time to study the RECORD as they would like to. It is a vicious circle we find ourselves in and badly needs a remedy.

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], on January 13, 1947 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 93, pt. 1, p. 288, permanent edition) speaking in the Senate, stated a point that is certainly valid and requires serious thought. He said: "Sporadic inquiries by select committees lack continuity and fail to provide Members of standing committees with direct knowledge of the information gathered. In cases where legislative action is indicated, standing committees find it necessary to do much of the work over again."

I recognize that this same argument could well be applied against the proposal now being advanced and requires answering. I believe it can be answered in this way:

No one will disagree, of course, with the idea that Senators and Representatives must have direct knowledge of information upon which legislation is to be proposed and considered. It must be pointed out, however, that even with our traditional committee system, only a small fraction of the two branches of the Congress have had such direct knowledge. The overwhelming balance of either body has had to depend upon the hearings and reports as are printed for the information required. Additional information is supplied the respective bodies during debate upon the subject by the Members participating in the committee proceedings. The proposal being advanced today would continue and safeguard that same procedure by providing for representation from both branches of the Congress on each investigating commission authorized. I wish to emphasize this because it is most important. To insure complete bipartisanship, equal representation from both sides of the aisle is provided for, from each chamber, in addition to the other representation proposed.

The arguments of those of us who spoke in 1947 with respect to the procedures established under the Legislative Reorganization Act stand today as they did then. The procedures proposed today are intended to be used only when the standing committees by themselves cannot, for one reason or another, function in an investigating manner and which reasons have led to creation of special committees.

Not one iota of authority and responsibility provided in the reorganization act would be lost by the proposed procedure. It is to be used only in a supplementary manner and as an added tool of the Congress along with the reorganization act. It is conceded that the Congress, in its discretion, may continue the practice of creating additional special committees. It is within the province of each Congress to decide such matters for itself. The idea expressed in the proposal today is simply to provide a standardized and continuing procedure for the guidance of future Congresses and the immediate availability of existing machinery to handle matters of inquiry as and when they arise.

PROPOSED INVESTIGATING COMMISSION

Lest I be misunderstood, let me say, at the outset, that there are certain topics that are most suitable for strictly legislative investigation. These should not be and are not affected by the proposal herewith submitted. On the other hand, occasions will arise when ordinarily, under existing policy and procedures, a special committee would be created. It is to provide for such latter occasions this proposal is being advanced. We are familiar with the numerous precedents that exist for the creation of various ad hoc commissions such as the Wickersham Commission, the TNEC, Hoover Commission, and others. Much of value was accomplished by such commissions, and I am sure no one regrets that they were created or would argue the procedure which resulted in their creation.

The same procedure is recommended here, the only change being that it should be standardized and continuing, and that both Houses of the Congress participate in the decision to undertake the investigation. The reason for this being that both Houses would necessarily have to consider the legislative recommendations which may develop.

A reduction of the workload on Members of Congress and of investigating committee members could be reasonably expected to be considerably reduced under such proposed procedure.

It would eliminate frequent overlapping and duplication of investigation of similar subjects between the two Houses. It would relieve Members of additional burdensome responsibilities to what they already have and permit more time and opportunity for closer attention to their regular duties. It would eliminate the frequent charges of party and personal prejudice. It would allow greater objectivity in getting to the core of the subject under investigation. The reports of the commissions would be subject to analysis by the proper legislative standing committee for appropriate attention and action. The public's reception of such procedures would be greatly improved, which in turn would restore much of the public confidence in the Nation's legislative body which some past investigations have caused to be lost to a considerable degree.

The integrity of our economic and social life depends to a large extent upon the actions of the Congress in determining the policies affecting our institutions. In turn, the fact-finding necessary for these determinations becomes increasingly importtant and requires complete and thorough investigation and study. The mere mechanical problem of securing this information has become one of manifold complexities. The wise use of congressional powers and the tools at its command can do much to facilitate the execution of congressional responsibilities in the solution of these problems as they arise.

This responsibility has long been recognized, and, while fact-finding commissions have frequently been utilized, the practice has been neither uniform nor continuous. Marshall Dimock, a distinguished scholar and student of government, wrote in 1929 in his book, Congressional Investigating Committees, "It is to be hoped that eventually Congress will rely almost exclusively upon commissions composed partly of its own members and partly of technical or professional men. The business of the expert is to interpret and instruct, while the function of the legislator is to transmit such information to Congress and to get his recommendations enacted into law. This would mean more thorough reports and greatly increased efficiency in legislation. In Congress, even as in other fields, there must be greater specialization of function" (p. 84).

The committee system of Congress has developed to the point where it is an indispensable part of congressional machinery. It must remain so. But because of this very fact, and due to the increasing burden of work and responsibilities placed upon the Congress in recent years, this vital function of the committee system is being hampered and threatened with decreased efficiency and consequent lessening of its real and potential value to Congress. This is due largely to the simple fact that members of Congress simply do not have sufficient time to do all the things they otherwise could and would do.

Much of the work of Congress must be done outside the legislative chamber. It must be done competently, thoroughly, and expeditiously. The proposed bill contemplates no abdication of responsibility of the standing committees, but would provide a means of aiding these committees to perform more adequately their historic functions.

The American Political Science Review for October 1949, carried a scholarly article, or series of articles, in the form of a symposium on the so-called Hoover Commission. Part II of this symposium, written by Ferrel Heady of the University of Michigan, included an evaluation of a mixed commission, similar to the type which could be utilized under the present proposal. It merits attention here, and the observations set forth therein are well worth consideration. I therefore include an excerpt from Mr. Heady's article at this point in my remarks:

"EXTRACT FROM SYMPOSIUM ON THE HOOVER COMMISSION APPEARING IN THE AMERICAN POLITICAL SCIENCE REVIEW, OCTOBER 1949 (PP. 951–952)

"V. EVALUATION OF THE MIXED COMMISSION

"The operating history of the Hoover Commission, combined with consideration of the content of the Commission's recommendations as contained in its reports, and developments to date in the reception given these proposals, suggest the following observations concerning the value and use of mixed commissions: (1) The mixed commission offers a feasible method of providing balanced representation of varied interests and points of view in the investigation of basic public issues, without too much risk that the commission will split into irreconcilable factions. (2) A mixed commission, by reproducing in microcosm the contending forces which bear on the problems dealt with, may stake out a common meeting ground in its recommendations which is in accord with needs as developed by investigation, and which will prove acceptable to the legislature and to the public. Care must be taken, however, to avoid making easy acceptance the main criterion in deciding upon recommendations. Undue emphasis upon this may mean compromise before compromise is either necessary or desirable. Over-concern about the legislative reaction to proposals under consideration is naturally most apt to appear in the attitude of commission members drawn from the legislature. (3) The main value to be derived from the use of a mixed commission is that representatives of the principal schools of thought bearing upon the problem of study have a chance to participate on an equal basis in its work. Since marked differences in the public reputations or degree of participation of individual members of a mixed commission tend to convert it from a collective decision-making body to a ratifying group for one or a few key commission members, it is important to protect the opportunity for minority commissioners to express their views officially. Through the use of dissenting or separate reports for this purpose, the legislature can be given cogent arguments for different possible courses of action on debatable issues, which may serve as a springboard for legislative consideration and decision. (4) A mixed commission needs a highly competent central staff headed by an executive director chosen by the full commission after thorough canvassing of available qualified candidates. Details of internal management of the commission's work should be delegated to the director and staff. (5) The "task force" method of conducting research offers important theoretical advantages which can be fully realized only through comprehensive advance planning of projects by the full commission, careful selection of task force personnel, clear delineation of the scope of task force assignments, close supervision of the work of task forces, and submission of task force reports in ample time to permit commission consideration of them prior to the making of commission decisions. (6) The agenda for commission deliberations should be clearly laid out in advance of each commission meeting. Discussion should be focused on central issues rather than on details of content or the phraseology of commission reports. Preparation of draft reports based on commission decisions should be entrusted to staff writers, subject to subsequent commission approval. (7) The commission should devote close attention to such matters as the format, style, organization of content, and order of presentation of the report or reports containing its proposals, since the medium through which the recommendations are revealed may have a decisive effect upon the reception given them by the legislature and the public."

POLITICAL MOTIVATIONS

I am well aware of the political motivations on the part of Members of both our parties in prompting past and future investigations. They are historic, probably inevitable, characteristics of representative democracy and must always be recognized in analyzing the functions of the legislative body. The subject is admittedly a delicate one and I shall not, therefore dwell too much on it. I wish to say simply this—that party interest in any matter and the means to express it are not abandoned or prohibited by this proposal. Members of both parties in the Congress will continue to have the same opportunity to call for investigations and express themselves thereto. The only departure, as I see it, is that a better opportunity may be afforded to get at the real facts relating to the subject matter and a report thereon in a more expeditious fashion. An article by Dr. George B. Galloway, senior specialist on legislative organization, Legislative Reference Service, and which appeared in the American Political Science Review for February 1927, discusses this aspect of the present problem. I include an excerpt from this article in my remarks at this point:

"Any adequate analysis of the inquiries of congressional committees must take account of their political motivation; for it is evident that the influence of party has sharpened the edge of the inquisitorial sword. Indeed, all the great fundamental political issues which have agitated the Nation since its birth are mirrored in these investigations. Radicalism and conservatism, federalism, and States' rights, public lands and slavery, woman suffrage and immigration, Indian affairs and prohibition, the tariff and internal revenue—all have had their repercussions in Committee inquiries. The riddle of the parties may be read, in truth, in these activities. But if partisan acrimony has exacerbated the issues by which the fiber of the Republic has been tested and has reflected a lurid light upon them, it has also whetted an appetite to root out corruption from the national administration and has quickened the effectiveness of congressional control of the executive through the medium of the investigating committee. The hope of gaining a partisan advantage is less open to criticism when it results in the disclosure of some real abuse, while the presence of a spirited opposition usually prevents the punishment or defamation of the innocent. If, therefore, the itch for power and partisan malice have been at the bottom of most congressional investigations, they have also been both a salutary force in the direction of good government and a strong support of the investigative function.

"The hidden motives which prompt inquiry into governmental departments and officials are not merely political in the larger sense of the term. Resolutions of inquiry are sometimes sprung by individual Members with malice prepense in the hope of besmirching an enemy, warding off an attack, or gaining publicity. Many examples of investigations animated by meaner motives such as these could be given. Ninian Edwards' attack on Secretary Crawford in the 'A. B.' plot of 1824 is one. The inquiry into the conduct of H. Snowden Marshall, district attorney for the southern district of New York, in 1917, is another. Few, if any, in fact, of the investigations carried on between the First and the Sixty-ninth Congresses were devoid of personal strife or partisan purpose. The colorful threads of political motive can be traced throughout the patch-quit fabric which upward of 300 inquiries have woven between the legislature and the executive.

"The play of political passions may be noted in a few of these historic struggles. The very first inquiry on record—that into the humiliating collapse of General St. Clair's expedition against the Indians—was launched by the adherents of Jefferson in an effort to influence public opinion in the election of 1792 against Hamilton's selection as Secretary of the Treasury for a second time.[1] Again in 1793, the House inquiry into Hamilton's official conduct in response to the Giles resolutions of condemnation was part of Jefferson's plan to drive his enemy from the Cabinet.[2] Coming down to the thrilling thirties, we encounter a period of epochal party battles and fascinating personalities which were reflected in nine investigations launched by the opposition in Congress against Jackson. The inquiries which led to the impeachment of President Johnson in 1867 were also animated by strong political passions, while the frequent scandals of Grant's administrations were a tempting invitation to those who sought to assail the Government for political purposes. The Credit Mobilier, the star route frauds, the salary grab, and the Balknap impeachment—to mention only a few—were used to manufacture political capital. The competition between the parties for the spoils of office has been reflected through the years in repeated investigations of the customs houses, the Government Printing Office, the Bureau of Pensions, and other branches of the civil service. The congressional investigation which resulted from the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy in 1910–11 had a distinct political flavor, while it will be well remembered that the series of inquiries which absorbed the Senate in the spring of 1924 savored of personal spleen and party politics. The most recent example of a distinctly political inquiry was that ordered by the Senate on March 11, 1926, into the Tariff Commission.

"These illustrations will suffice to indicate the presence of party considerations and political interests in investigations of the executive conducted by committees of Congress. This is the more notable when contrasted with the absence of such considerations from the inquiries of similar committees of the British House of Commons. As a rule, the composition of these committees is independent of political motive, and almost invariably their work is concerned with the determination of questions of fact or with the formation of judgments based upon facts and the opinions of experts. Party fights seldom occur, because the British select committees are not intended to be the tools of party tactics, but to assist the work of the House.[3] With us, however, party affiliation makes for party prejudice, and our legislative committees do not exercise their quasi-judicial duties impartially. Their members feel obligated to advance the interests of the party which has elected them, sometimes even at the expense of the facts, and they rationalize their actions by identifying party interest with the general welfare. The temptation to transcend the proper limits of a public inquiry is, of course, very strong, and the disposition to enter the domain of private life and personal affairs very great. To gratify personal spleen or to disparage the opposition, excuses are often invented to justify the examination of immaterial witnesses. The door is open to an indefinite search after evidence and the proceeding converted into a fishing excursion. From political duties to private life has been an easy transition for the investigators, while the suspension of the usual rules of evidence and judicial procedure has too often transformed the legislative committee into a tribunal of inquisition. Inquiry into domestic life is not, of course, among the legitimate purposes of public investigations.

"But if many congressional investigations have been animated by partisanship in their inception, their methods, and their recommendations, it does not follow that they have been without benefit to or effect upon the public service. The value of many of these inquiries arises from the exposure which they bring and the cautionary example they set. The Government is ventilated, administrative evils are remedied, and a warning is sounded of the unfortunate consequences which await other malefactors. That there is a possibility of abuse for partisan purposes, and that sometimes private affairs are unduly exposed to the public gaze is perhaps inevitable in a government of fallible men, but the injuries thus done are inconsiderable compared to the evils that would result from depriving Congress of the power to supervise the public business or from hampering its committees from getting at the facts by a narrow legalistic attitude on the part of the courts.[4] In the final analysis, therefore, investigation may be viewed as the legitimate function and duty of a political party. It would appear to be part of its duty to reveal the errors, shortcomings, and misdeeds of the representatives of the other party in office. Thus a political party, to borrow a Hobsonian phrase, carries about with it an alembic which transmutes its leaden instincts into golden conduct." (American Political Science Review, vol. XXI, 1927, pp. 55–58.)

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. In conclusion, I wish to call attention again to a series of three articles which were inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD, pages A2701 and A2717, by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] and ably written by Lindsay Rogers, Burgess professor of public law, Columbia University. And finally, I ask that an editorial on this subject which appeared in the Salt Lake Tribune of May 17, 1950, be inserted at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

HOW MUCH SABOTAGE CAN UNITED STATES ENDURE BEFORE CONGRESS CHANGES INVESTIGATION METHODS?

Wisconsin's "wild man" has announced in a speech to the Sons of the American Revolution that the fight to expose what he calls communism in the State Department has only started.

What a strange commentary it is that this man should be chosen to address the golden jubilee of this organization comprising descendants of the patriots who pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor on behalf of the things Senator MCCARTHY is destroying.

Concurring with a conclusion of the Salt Lake Tribune that the MCCARTHY inquisition could not have benefited communism's cause more if it had been planned in Moscow, Struthers Burt eminent writer, comments in a letter to this newspaper: "Who knows, perhaps Moscow did [plan it]. Communism is unbelievably devious and in the ultimately stupid way of totalitarianism, is, like Hitler, often for the time being diabolically clever. Brighter men than Senator MCCARTHY have been fooled." Mr. Burt continues:

"You are right in calling for an investigation of * * * self-styled ex-Communists, suddenly so eager to testify. I agree with you, Communists do not change their spots. I know them pretty well. They may think they have changed, but they haven't. Ever to have believed in communism—actually and wholeheartedly—means an especial and painful sort of character and an inhuman and untrustworthy intelligence. * * * Communism is more than a social and political belief, that is, the communism of Russia; it is also, a psychological lesion, a disease both of the mind and the spirit.

"What proof if there that any of these eager ex-Communist witnesses have actually recanted? By their own testimony, in this present era of distrust and lies, it is impossible to judge by a man's words or even by his actions, it is necessary to know his secret thoughts and hidden motivation. And who knows the secret thoughts or hidden motivation of Whittaker Chambers, or Budenz, or the rest of them?

"What are Senator MCCARTHY'S credentials? To be sure, he had an honorable war record, but so had lots of other men of questionable beliefs. I am accusing no one of being a Communist, not even the self-styled ex-Communists; I am merely using Senator MCCARTHY'S methods of evidence: proof by analogy and guilt by association."

How long will the American people tolerate this ringing of false alarms all over the city, ostensibly to help the fire department?

As one commentator points out, Congress has usurped the functions of the judiciary without providing any of the safeguards against judicial tyranny that men fought for centuries to establish. The whole concept of Anglo-Saxon law, with its rules of evidence, its protection against double jeopardy, and its statute of limitations, is being wiped out before our very eyes by stupid and mean-spirited little men. No law contemplated by Congress will be the better for the persecution that now passes for investigation on Capitol Hill.

Many proposals are before Congress for changing methods of investigation. Senator FLANDERS, Vermont Republican, urges that charges of disloyalty be heard in private in the future. Republican Senator LODGE has repeatedly urged this. The weakness in the proposal is the inevitable leak. Enterprising columnists get the names and the nature of charges and gossip from "tattletale" Members of Congress.

A special investigation commission, made up of men not seeking political office and subject to headline grabbing, has been discussed here previously. Great Britain's tribunal of inquiry, following this pattern, has been successful. It can be called into existence by a resolution of both houses of parliament and it has all such powers, rights, and privileges as are vested in the high court.

Lindsay Rogers, Columbia University law professor, recently urged a similar congressional investigation commission. It would come into being upon concurrent resolution by Congress. Members would be named by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The commission would have the rights, powers, and privileges vested in United States district courts. Thus it could get the facts, and witnesses and persons under attack would enjoy safeguards of our American system.

The commission would naturally win public confidence. It would be conducted by trained experts not seeking personal political gain.

The present arrangement, in which the accusers are also the judges, where the investigators are juggling for political advantage, gives alarming impetus and power to the Kremlin's psychological war.

The hour is late for returning to the American way.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, out of order, I ask leave to introduce a bill, and request its appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 3775) to provide for the establishing of congressional investigating commissions, introduced by Mr. THOMAS of Utah (for himself and Mr. IVES), was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, in recent years, few problems have evoked more lengthy and bitter comment than has the role which congressional investigating committees appropriately should play in policing the executive branch of the Government. Unfortunately, this comment has too often failed to rise above the level of partisan controversy. I am very glad to join with my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Utah, in sponsoring what I believe is a constructive solution of this problem—a bipartisan proposal designed to deal with it effectively.

The increasing complexity and interdependence of modern society has forced the Congress to delegate authority. The details of programs which the Congress has neither the time nor the special competence to carry out are left to the bureaucracy. In our democratic society, representative control over this power—once delegated—is of basic concern. The Special Investigating Commissions, to be set up under this bill—would be designed also to examine exceptional administrative problems, problems of vital concern to the Nation as a whole which transcend jurisdictional lines of standing congressional committees. Successful operation of such Special Commissions would be an important tool for the task of popular control which our form of political organization requires.

This bill remedies many of the defects in congressional investigating committees which were highlighted in the 1946 report of the Special Committee on the Reorganization of the Congress. By providing for representation from both Houses and both parties, the objection that the Congress as a whole rarely has the benefit of information gathered by these special committees is largely obviated. The standing committees of both Houses could integrate the information unearthed by the Special Investigating Commissions, thus providing a ready background for remedial legislation.

Also, scrutiny would no longer be limited to a small group from only one House of the Congress. Problems vitally affecting the Nation as a whole would be investigated by Members of both the House and the Senate, aided by outstanding members of the public with specialized experience in the particular field under examination.

The addition of three members of the public at large to the investigating group would serve two crucial functions. First, it is reasonable to expect that the inclusion of men not presently active in the political arena would minimize those excesses which sometimes come with potential political motivation. There would be added further the benefits of the increased perspective which comes with active participation by commission members from outside the Halls of Congress. And second, by requiring fewer legislators on the investigating commissions, this proposal would result in a decrease in the workload for the presently overburdened legislative branch of the Government.

Responsibility for checking on the executive branch has always rested on the Congress—the only body representing all segments of the American public. Under this bill, the impetus of initiative would rest with both Houses of the Congress. Also, members from the public at large would be chosen—on a bipartisan basis—by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House from a panel appointed by the Chief Executive and confirmed by the Senate. Selection of public members from a list supplied by the President should bring about increased cooperation between the executive and the legislative branches—coordination aimed at fulfilling the present tasks of Government more efficiently.

This bill proposes no change in the scope of Congressional responsibility; its purpose is rather to fashion a more effective weapon for meeting already existing responsibilities. It is offered as a truly bipartisan approach to the entire problem of congressional investigations of the executive branch. In the light of most recent events, the urgent necessity for the reexamination and reorientation of present procedures cannot seriously be doubted.

Let us take heed lest the very goals which investigations seek to safeguard be destroyed in the process of their defense.

METHODS OF WINNING THE COLD WAR AND PROJECTING THE VISION OF AMERICA

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, since Monday, June 5, when I addressed the Senate at some length concerning the utilization of new techniques of television in the field of expanding and invigorating our American information service abroad, a considerable number of comments have come to my attention from various sections of the country. In large part, I may say, that the suggestion that we add the vision of America to the Voice of America has caught the fancy of a great many people who have corresponded with me about the situation or who have commented upon it publicly.

Furthermore, Mr. President, a great number of questions have been asked concerning its feasibility and with regard to the various methods and various types of studies necessary to put the suggestion into practice. Suggestions have come to me as how best to test this television process by having a practical demonstration in some specific area of the world. In my speech on the 5th of June I stated that I would one day this week again address the Senate concerning some of the methods which might be employed for translating this idea into a working, practical demonstration. Today I propose to address the Senate briefly in that connection.

I first point out that there is now available to the United States Congress a method whereby we can put the vision of America into practical operation under existing law. I have carefully examined the provisions of the so-called Smith-Mundt Act of the Eightieth Congress, Public Law 402. I find we have adequate authorization, provided finances are available, for erecting the kind of television relay station network and community reception screens which I described in my discussion on the 5th of June. All that would be required in order to put the program into operation, for example, in Turkey or in any of the other countries now served under the general supervision of the Voice of America administrative authorities, would be, perhaps, to add to the appropriation bill which we are about to pass, and in which money will be authorized for capital outlay for radio, the suggestion that the capital outlay be made available for radio or television, as the case might be. I am not sure that even that minor amendment is necessary.

A second suggestion for putting the program into operation is that the countries which are to receive this relay broadcasting system and television on community receiving sets would themselves finance the rather modest costs of constructing the system, which, as I stated a week ago Monday, would be approximately $4,000,000 for a country such as Turkey or Japan. The State Department could take, under contract, a certain amount of time for broadcasting and televising the American message, and the returns from such a contract could be used to amortize the cost of the installation. I think that is a perfectly feasible and workable method for putting into operation this new weapon for peace.

The third suggestion is that private corporations or companies or financial interests, either in this country or in Holland or some other area of the world, might themselves construct these relay networks for television, provided this Government would make the necessary negotiations with the countries in which the relay stations would be established, so they would have the authority to operate them, and provided, again, that the United States and, perhaps, Great Britain also, would take under contract a reasonable amount of time, the payment for which would amortize the costs of constructing these new television media of communication.

I might say, Mr. President, that since addressing the Senate a week ago Monday, I have been in conference with the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Barrett, in connection with the proposals. I do not in any sense desire to commit him or the State Department or anyone else concerning their reaction to the suggestion, but I am prepared to say that I know they have looked upon it with a friendly curiosity under the able, alert, and what I hope and what I am beginning to believe is the aggressive leadership of Assistant Secretary of State Barrett in this field. He has shown a very commendable willingness to consider suggestions for implementing our cold war against communism. I know he has assigned two members of his staff to make a thorough investigation of the practicability and feasibility of the use of television, and an analysis of various regions of the world in which that kind of program might conceivably produce the greatest dividends at this immediate time.

I have also made available to Gen. Douglas MacArthur, in Japan, my studies and findings in connection with the suggestion as they pertain to that particular area of the world for which he is responsible. I have not as yet had time to receive any response or reaction from General MacArthur in this connection.

Today, however, Mr. President, I am introducing a bill which has, as a part of its purpose, the bringing into focus of the best minds and talents and technicians of America to study and explore fully the utilization not only of television, but of other new techniques and tactics, by which the United States, at long last, can assume the offensive in the cold war in which we are engaged.

Out of order, at this time, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce the bill, and, since it is a short bill, I also ask unanimous consent to have the text of the proposed legislation incorporated in my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3780) to establish a Commission on Cooperative International Relations, introduced by Mr. MUNDT, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 1. (a) The Congress hereby reaffirms the objectives of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (Public Law 402, 80th Cong.).

(b) In the belief that these objectives should be expanded and advanced at the earliest practicable time if we are successfully to preserve the peace of the world and to combat the menace of international communism, it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress—

(1) to devise more adequate methods to be employed in presenting to the people of other countries a true picture of the American people, our ideals, our way of life, and the purposes of our foreign policy;

(2) to appraise the adequacy and effectiveness of existing programs in this field, particularly with a view to utilizing new techniques and facilities, with emphasis on the possible utilization of television techniques;

(3) in the light of the termination in June 1952 of so-called Marshall plan aid, to outline a program for winning the cold war by a vigorous prosecution of its economic, advisory, political, and educational phases, but excluding (for the purposes of this act) military aspects such as development and expansion of military establishments and armaments; and

(4) as an over-all guide in the attainment of the foregoing objectives, to utilize the principle of assisting, training, and equipping other peoples to help themselves as the best means of achieving the ideological and educational goals of our foreign policy within the limitations of our budgetary requirements.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION ON COOPERATIVE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SEC. 2. For the purpose of carrying out the policy set forth in section 1 of this act, there is hereby established a bipartisan commission to be known as the Commission on Cooperative International Relations (in this act referred to as the Commission).

MEMBERSHIP OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 3. (a) Number and appointment: The Commission shall be composed of 12 members, as follows:

(1) Four appointed by the President of the United States, two from the executive branch of the Government and two from private life;

(2) Four appointed by the President of the Senate, two from the Senate and two from private life; and

(3) Four appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, two from the House of Representatives and two from private life.

(b) Political affiliation: Of each class of two members mentioned in subsection (a), one member shall be from each of the two major political parties.

(c) Vacancies: Any vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, but shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 4. The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

QUORUM

SEC. 5. Seven members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum, but the Commission may fix a lesser number who shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking sworn testimony.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 6. (a) Members of Congress: Members of Congress who are members of the Commission shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of Congress; but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(b) Members from the executive branch: The members of the Commission who are in the executive branch of the Government shall each receive the compensation which he would receive if he were not a member of the Commission, except that he shall receive such additional compensation, if any (notwithstanding sec. 6 of the act of May 10, 1916, as amended; 39 Stat. 582; 5 U. S. C. 58), as is necessary to make his aggregate salary at the rate of $12,500 per annum; and they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the Commission.

(c) Members from private life: The members from private life shall each receive $50 per diem when engaged in the performance of duties vested in the Commission, plus reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of such duties.

STAFF OF COMMISSION

SEC. 7. (a) Appointment and Compensation: The Commission shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of such personnel as it deems advisable, in accordance with the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1949: Provided, That the Commission also may procure, without regard to the civil-service laws and said act, temporary and intermittent services to the same extent as is authorized for the departments by section 15 of the act of August 2, 1946 (Public Law 600, 79th Cong., 60 Stat. 810), but at rates not to exceed $50 per diem for individuals.

(b) Exemption from Penal Statutes: Service of an individual as a member of the Commission or employment of an individual by the Commission as an attorney or expert in any business or professional field, on a part-time or full-time basis, with or without compensation, shall not be considered as service or employment bringing such individual within the provisions of any Federal law imposing restrictions, requirements, or penalties in relation to the employment of persons, the performance of services, or the payment or receipt of compensation in connection with any claim, proceeding, or matter involving the United States.

EXPENSES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

EXPIRATION OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 9. The Commission shall cease to exist on February 1, 1951.

DUTIES OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 10. (a) Investigation: The Commission shall make a full and complete study of the operation of existing programs covering the matters referred to in section 1, to determine what changes therein are necessary in their opinion to accomplish the purposes and objectives therein set forth.

(b) Report: On or before February 1, 1951, the Commission shall make a report of its findings and recommendations to the President and to the Congress.

POWERS OF THE COMMISSION

SEC. 11. (a) Hearings and sessions: The Commission, or any duly authorized member thereof, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, hold such hearings and sit and act at such times and places in the United States or abroad, and take such testimony, as the Commission or such member may deem advisable. Any member of the Commission may administer oaths or affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission or before such member.

(b) Obtaining official data: The Commission is authorized to secure directly from any executive department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, independent establishment, or instrumentality information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics for the purpose of this act; and each such department, bureau, agency, board, commission, office, establishment, or instrumentality is authorized and directed to furnish such information, suggestions, estimates, and statistics directly to the Commission, upon request made by the Chairman or Vice Chairman

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, this bill proposes that the Congress create a Hoover type of commission to study the activities and the operations of the cold war. Under the terms of this proposed legislation the Commission would be referred to and known as the Commission on Cooperative International Relations. The Commission would be constituted precisely as was the Hoover Commission insofar as the selection of its members is concerned. We hear a great deal these days, and have heard something this afternoon, about bipartisan committees and bipartisan commissions. We well understand that there is only one genuine kind of bipartisan commission or bipartisan committee, and that is one in which the members are equally divided among Republicans and Democrats and are equally acceptable to the leaders of both the Democratic and Republican Parties.

We could all think through these problems much more clearly, Mr. President, if we were a little bit more meticulous in our use of the word "bipartisan," especially when it refers to the creation of a study commission or an investigating commission or committee of any kind. A bipartisan commission, so-called, which permits the leader of either political party to make the selections alone is bipartisan in name but not in fact, and its results are seldom, if ever, bipartisan in character.

So I commend to the attention of all my colleagues in both the House and the Senate that if they are interested in creating bipartisan boards or commissions, they follow the recommendations and example of the Hoover Commission, which was in essence, in fact, in name, and in reality bipartisan in character. It was bipartisan because its membership was selected in such a way as to be equally representative of the two parties and equally acceptable to the leaders of both of the two major parties. It should be noted that both Republicans and Democrats participated in the selection of that committee since when that Commission was created we had a Democratic President and a Republican Speaker of the House and President of the Senate.

The Commission which I propose in this bill is that kind of a bipartisan commission. It would be comprised of 12 members, 4 of whom would be selected by the President of the Senate, 2 of whom would be Republicans and 2 of whom would be Democrats; and 4 of whom would be selected by the Speaker of the House, 2 of whom would be Republicans and 2 of whom would be Democrats; 4 of whom would be selected by the President, 2 of whom would be Republicans and 2 of whom would be Democrats. The bill also provides that of the 12 members 6 shall be representative of Government, either of its legislative or executive branches, and 6 of them shall be representative of private citizens. It would be expected that in keeping with the principles, the philosophy, and the precedents of this proposal that the responsible leaders would be asked to recommend those appointed as Republican members of the Commission.

Mr. President, I propose that the Hoover type commission which I am suggesting in the bill primarily do four things.

First, that it devise more adequate methods to be employed in presenting abroad a true picture of the American people—our ideals, our ways of life, and the purposes of our foreign policy in preserving peace and combatting the menace of international communism.

Its second task, Mr. President, would be to study the effectiveness of the existing programs operating under the Smith-Mundt Act, Public Law 402 of the Eightieth Congress, and particularly utilizing new techniques and facilities, with emphasis upon the possible utilization of the new technique of television.

Its third task, Mr. President, in light of termination in June of 1952 of the so-called Marshall plan aid, would be to outline a program for winning the cold war by a vigorous prosecution of its economic, advisory, political, and educational phases.

Its fourth responsibility would be to utilize as an over-all guide in the attainment of American objectives in the cold war the principle of assisting, training, and equipping other peoples to help themselves, as the best means of achieving the ideological and educational goals of our foreign policy within the limitations of our budgetary requirements. It is in that connection, Mr. President, that I feel the utilization of television, as outlined in my address on June 6th, would find an especially prominent and useful part, and I am sure it would be considered very carefully by the Commission.

Finally, Mr. President, I suggest that the Commission report its findings to the President and Congress by February 1, 1951.

I feel that, in addition to the realistic suggestions for stepping up the effectiveness and efficiency of our cold war which would come from such a study by such a commission, we could rightfully expect two additional dividends to flow from the creation of a commission such as I am suggesting.

The first, Mr. President, is that such a strictly bipartisan Commission would give a real foundation for shaping a bipartisan foreign policy, because for the first time we could have a bipartisan foreign policy which was bipartisan in conception as well as bipartisan in implementation and support. We would have foreign policy recommendation in which responsible members of both political parties had participated in the studies, in the discussions, and in the decisions which had eventually produced the outlines of an all-American foreign policy. We would actually have a foreign policy which the entire American public could support, because they would know clearly that it was intended for the public good, that there were no political aspects to it whatsoever, that it was not influenced or directed in any sense by domestic political repercussions or pressures, and that it was the best conceivable foreign policy which the best minds of the two major political parties of America could produce after long, careful, and considered study.

The second dividend, which I think would come from these studies and recommendations in addition to plans for the utilization of television and for the use of other new tactics and techniques carrying the message of America to the areas in the world where it needs to be heard, would be that such a bipartisan commission, representing as it would members of the executive branch of the Government, members of the legislative branch of the Government, and members chosen from the private citizenry, would provide an effective voice to the American public in helping to formulate the foreign policies of the United States. I submit, sir, that in these times when decisions in foreign policy may very well spell the difference between war and peace, between success and disaster, between bankruptcy and solvency, and when such decisions in our foreign policy are so significant, it is highly important that we bring to the shaping of American foreign policies representatives of the legislative branch of the Government and representatives of the public at large.

I think it would be in keeping with the American concept of representative government. I think it would be in keeping with the American processes of democracy.

Today we in the United States under our great Constitution pretty well have representative participation by the people, either directly or through their chosen representatives in the legislative branch of the Government, in the shaping and formulation of domestic policy. However, because in the days when the Constitution was written it was never envisioned that a time would come when decisions in foreign policy would be so prodigious and significant that they would change all considerations of domestic policy, a tremendous amount of authority in the field of foreign policy was reposed in the executive department, in the Office of the President. Increasingly by precedent and practice the President has tended to bring unto himself ever greater authority in the field of shaping our foreign policy. The soft phrase appearing in the Constitution that these decisions shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate has come to mean in large part that the decisions are made by the Executive in advance of consultation with the Senate and the Congress. Then, faced with a fait accompli, pressures are applied to Congress to endorse and approve decisions previously agreed upon by the Secretary of State or the President of the United States.

This proposed commission would bring into being a little bit more of the realities of democracy in the shaping of our foreign policy, because the commission would bring into consultation in this connection Members of both the House and the Senate and Representatives of the people at large for the purpose of making recommendations next February 1 to the President and to Congress as to the best procedures to follow in getting along with the job of winning the cold war.

It is true that the President would not have to accept these recommendations. It is true that the Congress would not have to accept them. But it is equally true that we would be putting into the field of shaping our foreign policy in these perilous times a refreshing aspect of working democratic principles which today do not operate.

All too frequently decisions are made in the White House or in some far-off capitals of the world by touring Secretaries of State of the United States.

Then they come back to Congress and say, "You must uphold the hand of your leaders. You must maintain the honor of America. You must keep faith with our associates. You must rubber-stamp and endorse and approve what has been done." They say to Congress, "You can change a decimal point, you can knock off a cipher, or you can agree to put the contribution in two installments instead of one, but you are committed, by these decisions made by the Executive, to the determinations previously agreed upon."

I think it is important in this country that we consider the degree to which we are gradually departing from the processes of freedom and democracy in the formulation of our foreign policy. I think it is worth our time to reflect for a while actively upon the fact that while we have been able for more than a century and a half to retain such a high degree of legislative responsibility, authority, and processes of democracy in the field of domestic policy, we have steadily but surely been moving in the direction of the authoritarian state when it comes to matters of foreign policy.

I do not propose an amendment to the Constitution. I do not propose that we change this whole procedure by some great executive action or by some legislative mandate. I do propose, however, in the interest of winning the cold war, when it is so essential to have behind whatever program is written the full support of the American public, a bipartisan commission which could wrestle with the problem and bring into focus in establishing our foreign policy, representatives of the people, representatives of the House, representatives of the Senate, and representatives of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. President, I should like to recite very briefly a few reasons why I feel such a commission and such a revitalized attack on the problems of the cold war are necessary now. I would say that, regardless of the fact that I am one who deplores the tendency to move into the executive offices the almost unchallenged and unchallengeable authority today exercised to make decisions on foreign policy, I would not raise my voice to suggest some different approach if the results of what had been done were either entirely satisfactory or manifestly hopeful. Judged by the results, however, we can find eloquent testimony in support of some new approach such as I have suggested, based upon the record of what has come out of the experiences of the last 5 years. I suggest this new approach, Mr. President, this bringing into being of a group mind to help formulate the policies to be recommended to the country, and I think it is supported by the kind of evidence I have indicated.

In my opinion, forgetting for the purposes of this discussion such instances at Yalta, Tehran, Potsdam, the sell-out of Poland and the sell-out of China, forgetting those specific instances for the purposes of the discussion, let me say that I think the main, overriding deficiency in our prevailing foreign policy is the fact that our foreign-aid programs today are essentially holding operations; holding operations for the purpose of buying time, we are told. One sometimes wonders who is the beneficiary of the time we propose to buy at such great cost to our taxpayers and ourselves.

What I think we need, instead, is for the United States to go on the offensive in the cold war. I think we need a peace and freedom offensive which will employ tactics and techniques conceived in the United States, and which are positive in purpose, rather than simply continuing to shape American policy abroad as an expanding patchwork of expensive expedients devised as reactions to something the Russians have been doing the previous 2 weeks. I believe any fair appraisal of our foreign-aid program, of our arms-aid program, of our unfolding foreign policy abroad in Europe or in Asia for the past 5 years, indicates clearly that the best that can be said of it is that it is a series of reactions to something the Russians have appeared to dictate by their action sometime in the preceding few days or few weeks or few months. I do not believe that is an adequate basis on which to build the foreign policy for as great and free a Republic as the United States.

Among other things, we have to start making clear to our associates on the side of freedom in this cold war that we want to help them to help themselves, that we are in the business of aiding them to help protect their liberties and their freedom, and that we should dispel for all time to come the growing concept in the minds of some Europeans and Asiatics who are beginning to believe that the United States is a great frightened giant coming to them asking them to help us defend ourselves. I think it is important that we keep the picture clear.

I believe we are living in one world. In my opinion an attack by communism against any area of freedom may well be an attack upon the whole freedom area of the world. But I also know that we are the strongest bastion of freedom. We are not the first line of defense—we are the last. We are eager to the extent of our ability to help everyone who is willing to help himself, and to help us, and to help others, defeat communism, but if the countries of the world come to the United States and say, "You need our support, you need our assistance, and without your giving us $2,000,000,000 every Thursday morning, or every Friday afternoon, or every December 1 you cannot count upon us," I think we have to dispel their illusion.

I think we have to get our foreign policy on a more realistic basis. I think we are working in a common cause to a common end, but if anybody is helping someone else because of a desire to retain freedom around the world, it is the United States that is helping others, and we are not appearing in the councils of the world as supplicants, urging people to come to our assistance to avert depression, or to avert political collapse here, or in order to protect us from an attack from Russia.

But there is something more important than that, Mr. President. I think the time has come when we should start utilizing clearly the principle of assisting and training and equipping other people to help themselves, as the best and perhaps the only means for achieving the ideological and educational goals of our foreign policy, within the limitations of our budgetary requirements.

Frankly, I think the time has come when we should counsel with our neighbors and our friends about a quid pro quo, about what we can expect to receive in return for our arms, and our tanks, and our planes, and our billions of dollars, and our support.

Partnership implies that assistance shall flow both ways. Partnership implies that there shall be a unity of purpose. To me partnership implies that when the United States—rightfully, in my opinion—deprives its processors and fabricators of the privilege of selling material of war to Russia today, partnership implies that those to whom we give billions of dollars in cash, or in products, or in raw materials, should likewise discontinue shipping war supplies to Russia.

Perhaps it is a moot question whether the United States can long enough afford to bail out and brace up the free areas of the world, to strengthen them adequately so that communism will crack under the strain. Whether it is a moot question or not, perhaps it is a calculated risk we have to take. At least, I voted for the Marshall plan, and I voted for the Truman doctrine. I have not only voted for those measures, but I have initiated such legislation as the Smith-Mundt bill and the UNESCO enabling legislation to help carry on the cold war and to create a world climate in which peace can survive.

However, it runs pretty clearly in my mind that it is not a moot question when it is asked in this way: Is the United States strong enough to be able to arm both sides of another conflict? Is the United States rich enough to provide money and food and fabrics and arms for western Europe to make it strong, while at the same time helping western Europe provide food and fabrics and arms and equipment for the Russian area also to make it strong, until finally one side or the other gets strong enough to challenge the rest of the world to a war? I am pretty clear in my mind that, rich as we are, strong as we are, we are neither rich enough nor strong enough to be able to finance, as we so clearly do today, both sides of that kind of an armament race.

There is no difference, when we analyze it, to my mind, whether we permit American fabricators to ship supplies of war to Russia direct, so that American labor can be employed, so that we can get a quid pro quo of timber, or vodka, or furs, or what have you, from Russia—there is no difference, in my mind, whether we ship material of war direct to Russia, or whether we ship it down a triangular route, permitting the supplies to stop in London, or Scotland, or Wales, or France, or Italy, or elsewhere in Europe, and after being fabricated and processed then in turn be reshipped to Russia for a quid pro quo which the French or the British or the Italians receive in terms of wheat, or lumber, or furs, or vodka, or caviar. No one denies that that is going on today; no one denies it at all. Those facts stand out as clear, Mr. President, as the path through the country-school yard. Yet they go on. Yet, we continue with the cold war, not measuring our program and policies by any realistic rule which decides finally whether or not we are helping both sides of the cold war, or the Russian side, or the free side, or neither side.

I know what I want to do. I want to help the free side. I do not want to help both sides. I do not want to help the Russian side. I dislike being made accessory to the crime, as the United States has been made accessory to the crime, of arming Russia now. I think a realistic bipartisan commission such as I have suggested, Mr. President, would find out all the facts about these reshipments of supplies to the Communist war lords, and recommend to Secretary of State Acheson and President Truman that that kind of nonsense be stopped now. I believe Congress would support such action.

Mr. President, there is only one way to end the cold war, and that is to win it, unless one is an apologist or a defeatist who is willing to subscribe to the doctrine that we can afford to lose it. I think we have got to win it. It seems to me the only way to win it is to take the offensive, is to start some kind of positive approach. It seems to me the only way to win the cold war is to develop an American foreign policy of forward action rather than continuing a policy of defensive reaction to what the Russians have been dictating by their policies and attitudes. I think America has to begin originating and initiating programs of activity best designed to serve the cause of freedom rather than following this melancholy practice which we have been following for so long of finding ourselves committed to policies and programs which in reality are not conceived in America at all, but are dictated by the members of the Politburo in Moscow, who decide where to put the pressure, where to make the next threat, when to challenge us in Asia, when to rock the boat in Berlin, and when to try to jeopardize tranquillity in the Balkans.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in a war of words, the same as in a war of weapons, a successful adversary must carry the combat to the areas which he seeks to capture or to win. I think that the policy of simply staging a series of holding operations is not sufficient. I think it is not enough that we merely buy time while the Russians buy arms from our allies. I think it is not enough that we buy time while they burrow into governmental offices here and seek to pervert our policies. I think it is not enough that we buy time while Communist gangs in France throw into the sea the armaments we ship them as a part of the arms-aid program. I think it is not enough that we buy time until and unless we are positive that that time is paying bigger dividends to us than it is paying to the Russians as they march madly on, building atomic bombs, increasing the size of their army, increasing the size of their navy, building snorkel submarines, getting ready for a war.

I think it is not enough that we simply buy time while the Russians continue to stultify every constructive effort we make at Lake Success in the United Nations to provide an adequate, collective security, or to provide international controls that will work and can be depended upon to demilitarize atomic energy. I think we have got to begin asking ourselves, as such a commission as I have suggested can ask the questions and answer them to the American public: For what do we buy time? What should we be doing while we are paying for that time? How can we be sure that our holding operation is not tending to weaken us financially and psychologically and geographically, and even militaristically, as compared with what is happening in the satellite countries and in Mother Russia?

YOU CAN'T HOLD A BEAR FOREVER

Mr. President, it seems to me that holding a bear is a rather dangerous and ineffectual operation. Sooner or later I think that those holding the bear are going to become weak or weary, and release their hold, and when that happens, and the restraints upon the bear are gone, they are going to be confronted with an animal of increased savagery and anger, eager certainly to turn upon those who have been holding it for the time being. I think that if they are going to hold a bear they have to make mighty certain that while they are holding him he is growing weaker than those engaged in the holding operation. I think they have got to make sure that when they release the bear, the bear has not become stronger while his captors have become weaker. I think they have to release him in an environment and in an economic and political climate which will make sure that the bear is not going to run the show once they release the hold.

I have not had anything from the State Department indicating to me that that has been happening. While we have been holding the bear in the Balkans, while we have been holding the bear in Europe, while we have been holding the bear in Africa, I certainly have not had indicated to me by the State Department, Mr. President, anything which would suggest that the bear has been growing weaker. While we have been leading him on a leash closer and closer to China so he could devour that country more quickly while we retain what we call a hold upon the bear, it is clear he has not been growing weaker, either, in China.

I think a commission such as I have suggested would look the facts in the face. I think it would not be predisposed either to be supercritical of the State Department and the President and the administration for its intolerable errors at Yalta and Potsdam; nor would it be predisposed to have to support every existing policy simply because it was conceived by a gentleman who used to have his residence in Missouri, or by whoever may be currently serving as our Secretary of State.

I think the commission could look the facts squarely in the face, and I would hope that being distinguished Americans, as they would be, they would bring back next February a report to the President and the Congress saying, "This is what we think should be done to develop a forward-moving foreign policy for America; to replace the costly holding operation which now passes as a foreign policy. This is what we think should be done to win the cold war rather than simply to perpetuate the costly armistice."

I think the recommendations would be heeded by the White House and by the Department of State because I believe they are peopled largely by patriotic men. I think the recommendations would be heeded by the Congress, too, because the failures of past policies of both the White House and the State Department have manifestly demonstrated that we need a new pattern to follow if we are to escape bankruptcy and disillusionment and the disastrous consequences of simply bailing out money to buy time when no man is prepared to answer the question, "For whom are we purchasing the time?"

The other day I was reading an interesting report called "Thought War Against the Kremlin." It is one of the Human Affairs pamphlets published by Henry Regnery & Co., in Chicago; and it is written by a great American, whom most of us know, Gen. Bonner Fellers. Gen. Bonner Fellers was very prominent in World War II, especially in the field of psychological warfare. Among other things, he was psychological warfare officer against Japan. No one will deny that next to the atomic bomb, our very good psychological warfare against Japan helped bring about the capitulation of the enemy.

I wish to quote a statement or two from Gen. Bonner Fellers. He begins on page 3 of his treatise, "Thought War Against the Kremlin," with this statement, which comes immediately after a description of the author:

> In the cold war now under way, Stalin strikes and we parry the blows.

Mr. President, I think that statement epitomizes in one sentence virtually the essence of what is wrong with American foreign policy today—namely, that "Stalin strikes and we parry the blows."

I read further from General Fellers' treatise:

> The advantages in modern warfare, however, are overwhelmingly with the offensive.

Mr. President, that is equally true of either psychological war or of military war.

I continue to read:

> This is as true in a cold war as in a hot or shooting war. Our defensive strategy may postpone defeat—it cannot guarantee victory.

Mr. President, I wish that statement could be written across the doorway of every office in the State Department. I wish it could be emblazoned on a brass disc motto of some kind in every office in the White House. Let me read it again, in these terrific times:

> Our defensive strategy may postpone defeat—it cannot guarantee victory.

Mr. President, all I ask is that we get off the defensive, off the negative, and onto the positive, and that we do it after careful consideration by a bipartisan commission of America's most distinguished citizens, chosen equally from among its private citizens and its public officials and from both of the great major political parties.

Mr. President, we hear so much lip service being given these days to the concept of a bipartisan foreign policy that we can almost hear its reverberations rolling back from every whistle-stop made by the train on the recent Presidential tour. However, here is a way and a means for actually developing and evolving bipartisan foreign policy—bipartisan in concept, realistic in purpose, devoid of all partisanship—to explore where we have gone, where we are now, and what we are to do in the future. No one can gain from that, Mr. President, except America. No one can lose from it, Mr. President, except communism and the Russians.

I read further from General Fellers' treatise:

> If we want to win the present bloodless contest, and thus head off a shooting war, we must seize the initiative. We must shift to the offensive.

Oh, how important that is, Mr. President, when we consider how our present foreign policy has evolved since World War II. After the melancholy adventures at Yalta and at Potsdam, which I shall not discuss today, I suppose the first chapter of our foreign policy thereafter was the so-called Truman doctrine, which I supported. Was that doctrine an offensive gesture, Mr. President? Was it seizing the initiative? Was it going on to the positive?

Mr. President, that doctrine was a defensive gesture, because a few months previous the Russians had indicated they were going to take the Dardanelles. I was on the committee, along with the present Vice President of the United States, then the senior Senator from Kentucky, which explored conditions in Turkey and in Greece. All of us on the committee recommended that there be appropriated in that connection the money which Congress did appropriate. We supported the Truman doctrine. I think it has done a considerable measure of successful service in strengthening the hands of the Turks and the Greeks. However, it was not a positive approach. It was a reaction dictated by something the Russians and Moscow had threatened to do. It was and it still is a holding operation.

Let us move on in considering what our foreign policy has been. The second chapter, as I recall, was the Marshall plan. We adopted the Marshall plan, not as a positive suggestion conceived in America and directed by American purposes, but because of the threats the Russians were then making in upper Norway, in central Europe, in Italy, and in France, to take over, through communism, either by outside aggression or by inside infiltration. I was on the committee which explored that situation. We returned and recommended that the Marshall plan be approved. I supported it in public addresses in more than half the States of this Union. I thought it was necessary then; I thought it was a calculated risk; I thought it was at least an approach which should be made as a holding operation—and that is all it was. It was not what this great tactician, General Fellers, has in mind, when he refers to the necessity for our "seizing the initiative." It was an attempt to do something before it was too late.

So we can analyze, so we can describe, so we can define, other chapters in our foreign policy.

Then came the Atlantic Pact—not an action by us in seizing the initiative; on the contrary, in its very support those who lauded it the highest said, "Because of the Cominform, created in Belgrade, under the auspices of Moscow, with its headquarters' offices subsequently moved to Warsaw, we need on the free side some kind of coalition, some kind of cooperative activity, some kind of offset."

So, Mr. President, what did we do? We had the Atlantic Pact to offset the Cominform—our group to offset their group, a defensive measure, a defensive gesture, a reaction to something the Russians had done, not a foreign policy conceived in America, not seizing the initiative, not a positive approach, but just another patch on the crazy-quilt in the form of expedients dictated by what has flowed out of the Kremlin.

So we decided to arm the Atlantic Pact countries. The reason for that is that we had ferreted out from inside the iron curtain the information that the Russians were spending $20,000,000,000 on armaments in their lands, and we translated that into terms of their slave labor and then into terms of what armaments could be purchased under the American system for those amounts, and we realized that that was a terrific armament. So we send arms to the Atlantic Pact countries as a defensive measure, as a holding operation, as one more American reaction to a Russian thrust.

I am not criticizing these holding operations, Mr. President, except to say that we cannot win a war on the defensive. We cannot make headway while we are standing still. We do nothing to weaken the bear while we hold it with one hand and feed it with the other. I think the emergency is great enough, the challenge is prodigious enough, the lack-wisdom policies so far provided by the administration are clear enough, to justify the appointment of a Hoover-type commission on the cold war.

That is all I ask—to get off a dead center, to start moving ahead, to let bygones be bygones for the purposes of this commission, to look for a bright tomorrow, and to do something to carry the ball toward the goal of freedom before it is too late.

Mr. President, let me say in conclusion that I consider television to be one of the new and dynamic and dramatic cold-war weapons available to us on our side of the conflict. It is one device at least for carrying the message of America to the areas we are trying to win and to keep and to reinvigorate and to brace up, and to associate ourselves with in some kind of forward-moving action in the cold war. It is now available. By next February I should hope a commission such as this would find a very important place for the new television techniques, with their relay stations, with their very modest costs of installation, with their huge community receiver screens, so that 1,000 or 2,000 people could watch a picture on the screen simultaneously, thus affording a chance to do something except trying to break the jamming, which once again is a defensive gesture against the fact the Russians have imposed jamming against the present Voice of America program over conventional radio.

Mr. President, I can see how, in Germany or in Japan, where we are trying to democratize the people, where it is possible for 500 or 1,000 persons in a public meeting place to watch a stirring picture of democracy and freedom and private enterprise portrayed on a community television screen, a tremendous impression would be made upon those who have never had a chance to visit this area, who have never had a chance to watch our modern farming operations, who have never had a chance to study and to appreciate our fine hygienic and sanitary regulations and conditions.

I can see how in the case of a friendly country such as Turkey, which, in my opinion, we should today be positively helping to make strong and vigorous, we could be encouraging a closer and closer and closer alliance, so that we could help establish there offensive bastions of freedom if need be, air strips and harbors, areas from which, if necessity commands, we could launch an offensive quickly against the vital spots in Russia, which are the oil-production areas of that land, everyone of which is vulnerable to an air attack from Turkey.

I can see how in a country such as Turkey, for $4,000,000 initial outlay and $250,000 costs annually for administering the program, we could bring to them economic lessons, hygienic lessons, and the story of freedom and of enterprise. We could help the newly elected President of Turkey, who is dedicated to increasing the environment in which freedom and free enterprise may operate in the new Republic of Turkey; we could help him in his crusade. We could win friends and influence people in Turkey by presenting to them regularly in groups, by means of a television screen, the vision of America, along with the Voice of America.

Finally, I may say, and then I shall close, that to underwrite the cost of the cold war, regardless of whether we pursue it as at present on a defensive basis only, or whether we seize the initiative and move forward in a more typical American fashion, moving forward as a consequence of plans and proposals and policies devised as I think they would be by such a commission as I am suggesting in the bill introduced today—regardless of what we do, the expense for many years is going to be tremendous. No bipartisan commission is going to find a cheap or easy answer to the problems of the cold war. The main thing for us to know is that the money we are spending is buying good results for freedom, not for tyranny.

But to enable us to spend the money and to raise the taxes, every economist in the land recognizes that it is necessary for America to maintain steadily an expanding economy. We cannot afford to tail spin into a depression. We cannot afford to have our economy freeze at a specified level and not continue to expand. We cannot afford pump-priming in Government spending as a synthetic expedient to produce prosperity. We need continuously an expanding economy. How best to get it? Where are the markets? Who are the people with the greatest needs?

Mr. President, the answer seems clear: It is in those great, heavily populated, underdeveloped regions of the world represented by people of Indonesia and by the people of China—if there is ever again a free China—even by the people of Japan; by all the teeming millions in the Arab world, people with simple needs easy to satisfy, needs which can be quickly supplied with a small amount of purchasing power, once the desire is there. How best to stimulate desire on the part of people then to show those who have never used a hoe just what a hoe can do in the business of farming; to show those who have never used a scythe just what can be done with that in the business of harvesting; to show those who have never walked in shoes, how helpful shoes can be. Television can bring those rudimentary developments to the attention of people who have never heard of them and who have never seen them.

Stimulating the desire, and the desire added to the need, leaves only the power to purchase necessary to stimulate an expanding economy in great industrial America, which is equipped to supply those wants. And most of the areas of the world have the purchasing power; they have the ivory or the cocoa; they have the tin or the mica; they have the manganese or the spices or the bananas or the tea which Americans want.

If we can stimulate the desire and the want, we can create an ever-expanding economy for the products of American industry, and also for the products of American agriculture; and if we can keep our economy expanding, we can continue to underwrite the terrific costs of a cold war, whether fought defensively and pessimistically as at present, simply buying time, or whether fought victoriously and valiantly in the true American spirit, where the initiative rests with us—either way, we can then afford to continue a war which today we dare not afford to stop.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Swanson, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (S. 3181) to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. SPENCE, Mr. BROWN of Georgia, Mr. PATMAN, Mr. HAYS of Arkansas, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. KUNKEL were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to provide the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all immigrants having a legal right to permanent residence; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. WALTER, Mr. GOSSETT, and Mr. GRAHAM were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message further announced that the House had severally agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

H. R. 3436. An act to amend section 3 of the Lucas Act with respect to redefinition of request for relief;

H. R. 5541. An act to amend Private Law No. 463, Seventy-sixth Congress; and

H. R. 7047. An act for the relief of Mrs. Tomo Nonque Rosevear III.

The message also announced that the House had severally agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the following bills of the House:

H. R. 714. An act for the relief of Pieter Cornelisten Wolde and family;

H. R. 1038. An act for the relief of William Richard Geoffrey Malpas;

H. R. 1609. An act for the relief of Arne Gordon Westly;

H. R. 2705. An act for the relief of Martin Kenneth Ikeda;

H. R. 2226. An act for the relief of Victor C. Kaminski (also known as Victor Kaminski);

H. R. 3009. An act for the relief of Dr. Ali Reza Bassir;

H. R. 3018. An act for the relief of Camilla Fabris;

H. R. 4532. An act for the relief of Dr. Ta Fu Wu;

H. R. 4903. An act for the relief of Krikor G. Guiragossian;

H. R. 5355. An act for the relief of Mindel Malek;

H. R. 6589. An act for the relief of Mitsue Miyamoto;

H. R. 6747. An act for the relief of Helga Holleb;

H. R. 6756. An act for the relief of Arthur Chen Shu Jee;

H. R. 6787. An act for the relief of Mrs. Kyoko Nakamura Kornhauser;

H. R. 6880. An act for the relief of Mrs. Kiyo Narumi Murakami and Keiko Narumi;

H. R. 6894. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nobuko Eto Heard;

H. R. 7035. An act for the relief of Hisako Sakata Ikezawa;

H. R. 7096. An act for the relief of Mrs. Maria Salome Holland;

H. R. 7292. An act for the relief of Erio Louis Tomita and Fumiko Tomita;

H. R. 7315. An act for the relief of Daijiro Yoshida;

H. R. 7363. An act for the relief of Suzuko Yagi and Anne Yagi; and

H. R. 7889. An act to postpone the application of the Classification Act of 1949 to certain employees of the Selective Service System.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send forward to the desk two amendments intended to be proposed by me to the House bill 6000, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table, to be subsequently offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTIN in the chair). The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant journal clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Martin
Benton	Hickenlooper	Maybank
Brewster	Hill	Millikin
Bricker	Holland	Mundt
Bridges	Humphrey	Myers
Butler	Hunt	Neely
Byrd	Ives	O'Mahoney
Cain	Johnson, Colo.	Robertson
Capehart	Kefauver	Russell
Chavez	Kem	Saltonstall
Connally	Kerr	Schoeppel
Cordon	Kilgore	Smith, Maine
Donnell	Knowland	Smith, N. J.
Dworshak	Leahy	Sparkman
Eastland	Lehman	Stennis
Ecton	Lodge	Taft
Ellender	Lucas	Thomas, Utah
Flanders	McCarran	Thye
Fulbright	McCarthy	Tobey
George	McClellan	Tydings
Gillette	McFarland	Watkins
Green	McKellar	Wherry
Gurney	McMahon	Withers
Hayden	Malone	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, after 2 days of debate on H. R. 6000, as amended by the Senate Committee on Finance, a good many things are now clear and understandable.

It has been agreed that the Senate will vote on H. R. 6000 as proposed to be amended, and on other amendments to be offered on Tuesday of next week, June 20. The Senate is anxious to rapidly dispose of H. R. 6000 in this session of the Congress, and has agreed to do so.

H. R. 6000 as amended will, to my mind, pass overwhelmingly when the roll is called next Tuesday.

Members of the Finance Committee, and other Senators who are the first to urge rapid passage, are first among those to admit that our social security system, with which H. R. 6000 deals, is possessed of basic weaknesses and faults and inequities which will continue to plague and jeopardize and harass the Nation for as long as our prevailing social security system is continued.

In recognition of the gigantic and dangerous faults contained in the present social security system, the committee will urge the Senate to approve a resolution which would authorize the Finance Committee to reanalyze and study the present system and every other possible system, and make recommendations for the future. One takes for granted that this proposed resolution, though it may be amended, will pass without a dissenting vote, because probably every Member of the United States Senate, if he has studied the question at all, is completely convinced that our present social security system must in time be replaced with some other security system which will actually provide, as the present system does not, for the security of our American aged population, present and future, and do so out of the earnings of our Nation's working force on a year to year basis.

H. R. 6000 will substantially increase the dollar benefits to those who are presently and will be beneficiaries of the system. This proposed increase in dollar benefits is nothing less than a recognition by the Congress that the Nation has cut the purchasing power of the American dollar just about in half since the social-security system was established in 1935, 15 short years ago. It ought therefore to stand to reason and publicly be stated by every Senator that there is no human way of determining social-security benefit dollar needs for the future until some way can be found to stabilize the purchasing power of our American currency.

Mr. President, the Senator from Washington believes that each of the statements he has just made are completely true, and point up the situation which confronts the Senate, the House, and the Nation.

For the sake of argument and in an effort to inform the American people of the quicksands and faults and betrayed hopes which constitute the foundation on which our social-security system was first established in 1935, the Senator from Washington will now assume that H. R. 6000, as amended, is not to pass. He wants to make a reasonable contribution to the Finance Committee study which is intended for the future, and this he can only do by constructively and vigorously attacking the prevailing social-security system and the proposals which are now before the Senate.

On May 24 the Senator from Washington spoke of the social-security question, which was not then before the Senate, and submitted a concurrent resolution which called for the appointment of a commission of completely independent authority, to undertake full time, divorced from all influence of the Social Security Administration, a complete investigation of the present social-security system and an investigation of other possible systems. In his statement the Senator from Washington paid his respects to the sincerity, integrity, and ability of the members of the Finance Committee. He stated that he thought the committee had done its level best with a completely impossible situation. He wishes now to reaffirm his respect for the committee. He has no personal interest in the resolution which he offered. He wants only to think that competent individuals within the Senate, with help of qualified persons outside of the Senate, will undertake the social-security examination to which his resolution was addressed. It little matters who does the work. The only thing that matters is that the work must and should be done.

The Senator from Washington will attempt this afternoon, in language which all Americans can understand, to prove that the present social-security system is a nightmare of madness and will continue to plague the Nation, including its beneficiaries, until the system is scrapped and replaced by a security system which will provide a reasonable amount of security for all our American aged and at a cost which the productive capacity of America can afford to bear. But before doing this the Senator from Washington wishes to offer comments which have been made by several other Senators since H. R. 6000 became the pending business before the Senate on Tuesday of this week.

On Wednesday of this week the chairman of the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from Georgia, said:

> The committee is not unconcerned with the eventual liability which this revision of the social-security program will place upon the Government and upon employers and employees alike, but we have proceeded with faith in America to meet the problem.
> There has not been sufficient time to arrive at definite conclusions on how the present aged who are not a part of the labor force should be protected from want.
> In urging the adoption of this bill, your committee is mindful of the fact that it does not do the whole job.
> Your committee has recommended therefore, that further study be given to this and other problems not resolved by the bill so that within the next year or two a sound social security system, which affords equitable protection for all citizens of the United States, can be put into full operation.

I think it was on Wednesday, which was yesterday, that the ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] said:

> Because H. R. 6000 is an improvement over what we have now, I give it my support. But personally, I feel that the present system, improved as it is by H. R. 6000, cannot be considered as other than one in transition. * * * As I see it, there will have to be wider coverage, leading perhaps to universal coverage.
> We will have to come, as I see it, to a truly pay-as-we-go system. There are many forces operating in these directions.
> This easy and deceptive method of raising money for general expenditures (social security collections being spent and bonds placed in lieu thereof) tempts extravagance.
> It argues for a pay-as-you-go system.
> In my opinion we are coming to a pay-as-you-go system.
> In my opinion that preferential treatment of the nature I have described will eventually bring us to universal coverage. I do not think it can be avoided.
> There is nothing in the reserve until a taxpayer is taxed to pay it off. As I said a while ago, the taxpayer, under wider coverage, becomes the same person as the insured man, and he therefore pays twice.

Yesterday the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] posed this question to Mr. MILLIKIN:

> Does that not also strengthen the argument that the so-called "pay as you take in" principle becomes almost mandatory?

The Senator from Colorado responded:

> It makes it so at least from a moral standpoint. If we do not want to be deceiving the people it makes it mandatory. There will always be, I assume, what might be called a "till fund" or small reserve, to prevent having to come to Congress every year to keep the outgo adjusted to the income. That kind of reserve fund, if we care to call it that, would be necessary, I think, under almost any kind of system that we might have. But the present thing—

And I would call the attention of every Senator and every other American to this sentence with reference to the reserve fund made yesterday by the very distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN]:

> But the present thing—
> Referring to the reserve fund—
> is a fake.

The Senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] had this to say on yesterday:

> As the Senator from Colorado pointed out, he and I, I think, voted for the increased coverage because we believe we are going in the direction where ultimately under this system, or otherwise, there will be universal coverage of everyone over 65 years of age.

Said the senior Senator from Ohio:

> I see no reason why the bill now proposed should be postponed; but I think also we should look forward to a substantial further change in the nature of the assistance, so that we are not today actually helping old people, who are not getting anything.

The senior Senator from Ohio had some other startling and interesting things to say about H. R. 6000 yesterday. He said:

> In other words, we are recognizing in this bill that we have an obligation to pay old-age pensions to people who are old, simply because they are old and not because they paid money into the fund.

He also said:

> However, as I see it, the bill destroys the whole theory of insurance. It recognizes an obligation. * * * All I regret is that we still use the name "insurance" when as a matter of fact there is no insurance about it.

That is the pronouncement which the senior Senator from Ohio made yesterday regarding this vitally important American question which is being considered by all of us at this time.

On yesterday the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] stated:

> One reason I am opposing this bill is because it does not provide security for our elder citizens.
> The bill simply patches up a system that is working badly.
> I want a system and a benefit that we can honestly pay for as we go, closing out each year's accounts when the year is over and beginning again when the new year starts.

Mr. President, the Senators from whose remarks I have quoted are all distinguished members of the Finance Committee. They are able and conscientious men. They are urging improvements and changes in a system which they state must be changed if our real intention is to provide real security for the aged of America.

I

Mr. President, perhaps the commonest word applied to the social security bill is the word "complicated." A truer word was never spoken. Here we have a piece of legislation which is primarily supposed to help old people. Yet when we come to examine the legislation we find it so complicated that it is hard to find anyone, old or young, who can understand it.

I can say that if anyone proposes to push his way through the accumulated materials on this bill, he has his work cut out for him.

I hold in my hand, merely by picking it up, a copy of the Senate bill. It weighs 1 3/16 pounds. The hearings on H. R. 6000 before the Senate Finance Committee weigh 4⅞ pounds. If we include the House hearings, the House report and the House bill, along with the Senate hearings and Senate bill, we have 12¼ pounds of material.

At a conservative estimate, leaning over backward almost far enough to break the spine, I estimate that all this material runs to well over 2,838,444 words.

The Senate bill alone runs beyond the length of a standard mystery novel, and any Senator who is interested in solving puzzles now has something very choice before him in the shape of this bill. It surpasses any mystery novel that I have ever seen in respect to the number of blind alleys, false clues, traps, and pitfalls planted along the way.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. Would the Senator say that the traps and pitfalls were there other than on the basis of having been planted by the committee, or did the Senator from Oklahoma rightly understand the Senator from Washington to say that they had been planted?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington does not believe that a single one of the traps or pitfalls to be found in this bill was planted intentionally within the proposed bill by any member of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CAIN. It seems to me to be obvious that pitfalls abound within the bill.

Mr. KERR. I understood the Senator to say that——

Mr. CAIN. Not because of any premeditated desire to plant them by the group of splendid men who make up the Committee on Finance.

Yet, complicated though it is, we must try to understand it, for it is, as I truly believe, one of the most unjust pieces of legislation we have ever had to deal with. I propose to discuss, in some detail. the Finance Committee report on H. R. 6000. But before I do this I want to say something about the existing social-security system.

II

What we now have, in dealing with old people in this country, is a system divided into two branches or stems: Old-age and survivors insurance, and old-age assistance.

These two operations are yoked together in a very strange way that is almost organic. They are Siamese twins and the role which they play in our economy is one of a most twisted and grotesque character.

On the one hand is old-age and survivors insurance. One of the first things we discover is that OASI is not interested in old people at all. It is interested solely in what the administrators call categories of employment.

I know many old people, but I have never met a category of employment. Yet categories of employment are the OASI's main stock in trade.

The essence of this part of the system is a deferred-benefit plan. Because its rosiest promises are always away off in the future, OASI, in its present stage, is a slight burden since the demands upon it are not great.

But as efforts are made to expand the system and bring additional groups under coverage, and as benefits are arbitrarily increased out of current social-security revenues, so the ultimate demands upon the system are made the greater.

It seems clear that in all probability these ultimate demands can never be met save with savagely increased social-security taxes or with some form of ever more cheapened and inflated dollars.

Incorporated in this OASI part of the system are numerous puzzles and hybrid philosophies.

For example, the contention is made that the benefit must vary according to the wage that is earned. The greater the wage, supposedly, the greater the benefit. This is the so-called incentive in the system. He who earns more deserves to get more they say. This incentive is supposed to operate according to some iron law of insurance, firmly based on a formula and a wage record. This is supposed to represent an equity. But this incentive is fraudulent as far as any insurance-annuity theory is concerned, for many beneficiaries pay, along with their employers, only a small fraction of what they get from the system.

At this point, the mechanics who have pieced this system together—and it has taken a long time to do it—are unwilling to stay put with their phony incentive, iron-law theory.

This equity, which the incentive man is supposed to have, by virtue of his taxes paid, is at once violated by another theory, the theory of "adequacy."

All "adequacy" means is that if the Social Security Administration stuck to their false contributory system, the lowest-paid workers would receive only a miserable pittance.

This would never do, they feel, so a portion of the incentive formula is thrown into the trash can and the calculations are arbitrarily changed once more, so that the lowest benefits are raised from a miserable pittance to just a semimiserable pittance.

In this way phony equity and phony adequacy get cozy with one another.

Leonard J. Calhoun, who from 1936 to 1943 was assistant general counsel to the Social Security Board, describes the system this way:

> For a large number of people the system is in effect a lottery, despite the adoption of the name "insurance." Nevertheless, it is compulsory. If you are engaged in certain work, you must pay in; if you are engaged in other work, you cannot pay in, even if you desire to do so; and the fact that you have paid in does not mean that you will necessarily get any benefits or protection (p. 24, How Much Social Security Can We Afford? by Leonard J. Calhoun, American Enterprise Association, Inc., April 1950).

This old-age and survivors insurance part of the social-security system is, for the immediate present, sustained by the special taxes paid by those covered and by their employers.

Since, however, there are still millions of jobs uncovered—and since many of these will still remain uncovered even if H. R. 6000 is passed—and since, also, there are millions of indigent old people who never could have qualified for OASI in any event, we have an additional piece of machinery, so large and complicated that it resembles one of Rube Goldberg's crazy inventions.

III

This Rube Goldberg invention is called old-age assistance. Old-age and survivors insurance is one of the Siamese twins. Old-age assistance throughout this great land of ours is today the other Siamese twin.

Perhaps I ought not to say Siamese twins, for, as used in this connection, it is a reflection on the Siamese people. To be more exact, I ought to call them the Altmeyer twins.

This old-age assistance twin is a kind of relief, generally with a means test, paid to the indigent on a basis of what is called need. Old-age assistance is subsidized jointly by the Federal Government and the States out of general revenues, and the amounts paid vary among the States. In June 1949 the range was from $70.55 per month in California to $18.80 per month in Mississippi. This wide range in old-age assistance makes the crazy-quilt crazier.

In its subsidy to the States for old-age assistance the Federal Government now pays three-fourths of the first $20 of an OAA monthly payment, and one-half thereafter, up to a $50 maximum. That is, out of the first $50 a State may grant, the Federal Government may now pay as much as $30. Anything above $50, the State must pay itself. As already stated, the range of what some States will pay above this maximum is very wide.

But there are two eccentric bearings in this OAA machinery which make already wheezing and grinding gears wheeze and grind the more.

First, old-age assistance is granted on the basis of need. I may ask, what is "need"? Nobody knows. It seems to be a local affair. I have looked high and low and I can find no Federal definition of "need" under the law, though hundreds of millions of dollars are being poured out every year. What is need? In California, one can own a home and a car and yet be in need of old-age assistance In certain other States, he cannot. What is right? The Altmeyer twins give us no help on this score.

California permits a person in this kind of need to own real property not exceeding $3,500 net county assessed valuation—State of California Department of Social Welfare Bulletin No. 389, OAS, December 30, 1949.

In Tennessee, on the other hand, an applicant is ineligible for old-age assistance if the assessed valuation of his home is more than $1,000—page 16, Social Security Bulletin, October 1949.

Where and what is need? Search the Federal law all you please, Mr. President, but you will get no help.

This failure to define need makes it possible for a State to exercise a wide latitude of judgment in determining who shall get old-age assistance.

I want it clearly understood that I am not at this point concerned with the amount granted in the various States. I will come to that problem presently. All I am trying to do now is to figure out the Boob McNutt character of the system's design.

Now for the second eccentric bearing in this crazy assistance machinery.

Because the Federal Government participates in payments up to $50 a month, it is possible for a State to enormously increase the amount of Federal subsidy it receives, with no commensurate additional expenditure of its own, simply by holding the sum paid below $50 per month. When a State starts paying $70 a month old-age assistance, that State is paying $40 out of that $70. But suppose the State hauls down the monthly below $50? Then, under the formula presently used, that State can count on getting the bulk of the assistance money out of the Federal Treasury, whose funds come from people in all the States. It was under these circumstances that the State of Louisiana in June 1949 was paying $47.05 to 819 per 1,000 of its "old folks," a circumstance which has been described as "a record for the United States if not for the world."

Back in 1934 when these matters were under consideration, the President set up a Committee on Economic Security to make recommendations. Who were the members of this committee? They were Frances Perkins, Henry Morgenthau, Homer Cummings, Henry Wallace, and Harry Hopkins. The glowing reputations of these persons for precision in judgment and for prudent management are well known to all. Surely we know all we need to know about Henry Wallace's fiscal genius. Anybody who wrote the GURU letters is an ideal choice to design a social-security system. As for Harry Hopkins, was he not the soul of probity? But I need go no further in discussing the high character and competence of this Committee on Economic Security.

HYBRID SYSTEM—NOT INSURANCE—NOT PENSIONS

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. MALONE. Before the distinguished Senator from Washington gets too far away from the question of assistance which the Federal Government might be forced to give the States under this arrangement, is it his opinion that eventually the Federal Government, under the plan for paying old-age pensions, probably will take over most of the load of the old-age pensions from the States?

Mr. CAIN. If I understand the Senator's question correctly, it would be my view that under the present social-security system we shall never be able materially to lessen the old-age assistance programs which are in vogue in the 48 States. It was always the intention of the supporters and of some of the designers of the present social-security system that in due time the financial load and burden and responsibility resulting from old-age assistance benefits in the States would be greatly reduced or wiped out altogether. It must now be recognized as a fact, and I think it is so recognized by every Senator, that a continuance of the present system would extend in perpetuity the old-age assistance programs, which every Senator wants to get away from at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. MALONE. At least as the junior Senator from Nevada understands them, neither the present system nor the one proposed by the pending bill provides either pensions or insurance. Both are hybrid things, with no particular background and no particular objective as to where they are going. What is the Senator's opinion about taking over the systems which differ in every State? Does the Senator think there has been sufficient study to enable us to understand the program the roots of which we are now planting deeper? Should the study contemplated by the resolution which the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Finance Committee, has offered, calling for a further investigation, be made before we determine to drive further in the direction we are going, or should we enact the pending legislation, thus driving the stake deeper, and then investigate the question further?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Nevada has posed not one but several questions.

Mr. MALONE. I realize that, but they are all woven together.

Mr. CAIN. Indeed they are, and I shall do my best to answer them in a concrete way.

In 1935, the record tells us, the Congress of the United States and the Executive recognized for the first time an obligation to take care of the aged in America. It was decided in 1935 that age 65 would qualify a person for benefits under the intended social-security system. That system was established in 1935, and it had, I think, as its completely legitimate purpose and objective, providing benefits to the aged population of America. Because the designers of the system recognize that it would take a great many years for the system to achieve its purpose, there was created a system to provide financial assistance to indigent persons within the States of the Union. The cost of providing such financial assistance was to be borne by both the State in question and the Federal Treasury. Having read the RECORD, I think I could establish it as being a fact that no proponent of the social-security system which was established in 1935 thought there would be remaining in the year 1950 any need for continuing financial assistance programs in the 48 States of the Union. It is now, I may say to my friend from Nevada, the year 1950. There are today approximately 11,500,000 Americans aged 65 or over. Approximately 2,500,000 of that total are being taken care of by our social-security system.

Another group approximating almost 3,000,000, I think, are being taken care of by the old-age assistance programs in all the States of the Union. Some five or six million persons beyond the age of 65 are neither benefiting from State help on the one hand, nor from Federal assistance on the other hand.

Those Members of the Senate who share the view being expressed by the junior Senator from Washington are merely trying to establish that a system which, in 15 years, has not carried out its admittedly fine purposes or achieved its noteworthy objective ought to be scrapped in favor of a system which will provide for the legitimate, reasonable needs, not of one group of America's aged, but of all of America's aged.

The Senate Finance Committee, in recognizing and having admitted freely and most frankly some of the basic faults within our present social-security system, wishes Congress at this time—and the Senator from Washington thinks Congress is going to act accordingly—to liberalize and expand the present system, regardless of how grievous its faults may be; and in recognizing its faults the Senate Finance Committee is asking the Senate to approve—and certainly the Senator from Washington hopes that every Member of the Senate will vote in favor of it—a resolution to authorize a concrete study of every other possible social-security system known to man in order that the Finance Committee may recommend basic changes and a future system by which to replace the present system at the earliest possible time.

I think the Senator from Washington has answered every portion of the questions propounded by the Senator from Nevada, with one exception. He wanted to know whether the Senator from Washington thought we should first expand and liberalize the system we know to be bad, and then examine what we have done and study other systems in the hope that we can recommend a far better system for the future, or whether the examination and the recommendations leading toward a better system ought to be made and established before we extend and liberalize the present system.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I shall be glad to yield in a moment.

The Senator from Washington, obviously, as an individual Senator, is of the considered opinion that it would be the best thing for the country to leave our present social-security system as it is until we know concretely and conclusively what better system we can adopt with which to replace our present system. In my opinion, such recommendations could be forthcoming from a qualified study group within a period not to exceed 2 years.

The Senator from Washington likewise is of the opinion that it is the desire—and I can understand it— of a majority of the Senate and of the House forthwith to expand and liberalize the present system, and then take time to consider and reflect on what we have actually done.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, there seems to be a slight misunderstanding of the program for tomorrow. Yesterday, in a colloquy with other Senators, I thought I made it perfectly clear that the calendar would be called tomorrow. There are two bills on the calendar which might be controversial. If so, they will be dropped to the bottom of the calendar. After we have completed the call of the calendar, we shall then proceed to the consideration of those two measures, which I deem of some importance and of which I think we can perhaps make disposition tomorrow.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois be so kind as to indicate the two bills to which he has reference?

Mr. LUCAS. One bill to which I referred, I will say to the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is Calendar No. 1790, House bill 7579, to extend the Rubber Act of 1948. The other bill is Calendar No. 1791, Senate bill 960, which has been reported from the Committee on Armed Services. Its title is "A bill to provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes."

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield so that the Senator from Kansas may propound a question to the majority leader?

Mr. CAIN. I shall be pleased to yield for that purpose.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Illinois that, with reference to House bill 7579, it was the understanding of the Senator from Kansas that there was some arrangement or agreement whereby, because of the absence of some Senators, that bill was to be taken up on next Monday.

Mr. LUCAS. If there is any question about that at all, it can go over until Monday, although we can discuss it tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the intention of the majority leader that the call of the calendar tomorrow commence at the beginning?

Mr. LUCAS. No; to commence with the first measure on the calendar as of June 8, 1950.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the consideration of unobjected-to bills?

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct, sir.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield for a question?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. Did the Senator make a statement as to how many aged would come under OASI, and how many under old-age assistance?

Mr. CAIN. Yes.

Mr. KERR. Will the Senator repeat the number for the benefit of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CAIN. Approximately two and a half million persons are now drawing benefits from the social-security system. Approximately 3,000,000 are drawing assistance from the assistance programs in the various States of the Union.

Mr. KERR. I understood the Senator to refer to a certain number of aged people. I presume that he now refers to all persons receiving benefits under both social security and assistance.

Mr. CAIN. Of some eleven and a half million persons in the country aged 65 or older, approximately five and a half million are drawing assistance from either the social-security system or the assistance programs in the States, as I understand.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma was under the impression that there were about two million under one system and about 2,700,000 under the other.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Oklahoma may be more precise. I think the figures can be very easily established. They have been offered in the past few days by the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Georgia. The main point involved is that of all the aged in this country a number less than 50 percent are drawing benefits from either a State or from the Federal Government, when, as I understand, it was our intention beginning in 1935 to work out for the future a system which would provide benefits to all of the aged population of America.

Mr. KERR. Is it not a fact that the two-headed or Siamese-twin system to which the Senator has referred, being old-age assistance on the one hand and old-age and survivors insurance benefits on the other, is very definitely limited by the terms of the legislation?

Mr. CAIN. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. In the assistance program it is limited to those who establish themselves as being in need under standards prescribed by the individual States, and in the other program to those who become eligible by their participation in the program.

Mr. CAIN. By their being covered.

Mr. KERR. Is it not also true that the limitations within the laws themselves applicable to those eligible or qualifying under the provisions of the laws make it impossible for the programs to cover other than those who are eligible?

Mr. CAIN. I think the Senator from Oklahoma is quite right. It is the intention of some of the amendments now before the Senate to increase the coverage in the social-security system in order that there may be more beneficiaries in the future. Those amendments are being offered, to my mind, because there is a growing acknowledgment of an obligation by the Federal Government to the aged of America. My contention is that, however we may amend or liberalize the present system, we are not moving in the direction of providing assistance or benefits to the aged population of America, as is the hope for the future of the junior Senator from Washington and of other Senators of like mind. We feel that if the Federal Government is to acknowledge an obligation to the aged persons it must of necessity acknowledge an obligation toward all persons over a particular agreed-upon age.

Who was the Chairman of the Technical Board of that committee? It was none other than Arthur Altmeyer, at that time Second Assistant Secretary of Labor but now and, for many years, the boss of our Siamese-twin system for jobbing old people.

What did that committee say in its report on the question of assistance money? I shall read a portion of it:

Old-age pensions—

And it was old-age assistance they were talking about—

are recognized the world over as the best means of providing for old people who are dependent upon the public for support and who do not need institutional care.

Only approximate estimates can be given regarding the cost of the proposed grants-in-aid. If a compulsory contributory annuity is not established at the same time—estimates indicate that the Federal share of the cost of the noncontributory old-age pensions may in the first year reach a total of $136,600,000 * * * and would increase steadily thereafter until it reaches a maximum of $1,294,300,000 by 1980 * * *. Obviously these figures will be reduced if a compulsory system of contributory annuities is established simultaneously with the Federal grants-in-aid. Sound financing demands this simultaneous action. (Pp. 40–42, House Ways and Means Committee hearings on the Economic Security Act, Jan. 21, 1935).

And such a contributory system was established at that time—

We have it established, all right, but there is no sign of reducing figures. Expenditures for old-age assistance have been climbing every year, old-age insurance or no, and there is no sign of let-up. Currently the Federal share of the subsidy is $8,000,000,000, with 1980 30 years away.

IV

To administer these two Siamese twins—OASI and old-age assistance—is no inexpensive matter, despite Mr. Altmeyer's claims of only 12 cents apiece to look after 80,000,000 wage records in Baltimore (p. 29, Senate Finance Committee hearings, January 17, 1950).

For the year ending June 30, 1949, it cost $53,000,000 (p. 6, Trust Fund Report, 1950) to administer OASI and $66,703,000—Bureau of Public Assistance, Social Security Administration—to administer old-age assistance—Federal share, $33,014,000; State and local shares, $33,689,000—a total of almost $120,000,000. If H. R. 6000 passes, some estimates run to $110,000,000 for the administration of OASI alone.

If we want to know why these costs are rising, the incredible jerry-built complexity of the machinery supplies one of the answers.

Of course it takes a small army of people to man this Rube Goldberg machine. Commissioner Altmeyer tells us that the Social Security Administration alone employs 11,900 persons (p. 35, Senate Finance Committee hearings, January 17, 1950). In addition to this, according to the most recently available figures (p. 8, Social Security Bulletin, April 1950) more than 56,000 persons are employed throughout the country in State and local welfare agencies. In all, more than 67,000 persons are officially employed in dispensing welfare in one way or another throughout the United States. To be sure, some of these dispensers of welfare are concerned with dependent children, the blind, and so on, but the chief business of these nearly 68,000 functionaries—Federal, State, and local—is looking after old people in one way or another.

That their labors are onerous we may well believe.

Philip Vogt, welfare administrator of the Douglas County Welfare Department, Omaha, Nebr., appeared last January before the Senate Finance Committee and described the social-security machinery in action. He said:

> In Douglas County, Nebr., the administration of assistance requires the understanding and use of 102 pages of finely printed State and Federal laws, a three-volume State manual of 1,001 pages of rules, regulations, and procedures, no less than 66 different forms and a food budget listing 124 amounts. Many other memoranda, special reports, attorney generals' opinions and modifications are forthcoming which add to the confusion and expense of operation. * * * We have a rather simple law. I mean our Social Security Act itself is not too complicated. But what comes out of that, thousands and thousands of pages of administrative rules and regulations and interpretations, is something else. Our administrators spend less than 20 percent of their time in the field. They are bogged down with the machinery and mechanics superimposed upon us either by State or Federal officials. (Pp. 528 and 555 of the typewritten transcript of the 1950 Senate Finance Committee hearings.)

Mr. President, the real problem with which we are concerned is the security of our old people.

When we consider this fact and then turn and, in perspective, view the weird monstrosity that has been cobbled together over the years, imagination staggers.

We have a hand-out system, old-age assistance. We have a phony annuity system, OASI, where many get a dollar for a nickel's worth of taxes. Both systems, yoked together, are called the social-security system, an adaptation of ideas originally set up in that paradise of bureaucrats, the German autocracy.

When we stop to consider the American genius in handling native organizational problems, our stupefaction grows.

In this country, where the founding fathers devised a governmental system of checks and balances, the most ingenious known to mankind;

In this country, where assembly-line manufacture was developed, a process which attained magnitudes of production that amazed the world;

In this country, where the demands of communication have been met, the physical tasks of distribution more brilliantly achieved than in any other place;

In this country, where men and women from thousands of trades and professions were able to man, equip, administer, and supply throughout the world the greatest military organization ever known;

In this country, I say, Mr. President, we have been content to supinely accept a jumble of alien theories for handling the economic problems of our old people, theories which never worked efficiently even in the countries where they were born.

In his testimony last January Commissioner Altmeyer told the Finance Committee that they had a right to be proud. I see no reason for pride. Our social-security system is a disgrace. The whole set-up is a gruesome example of where we can get when we start with a series of faulty ideas and, thereafter, expand and build upon them. Stage after stage is added to the superstructure, temporary props are put under the sagging floors. Political expediency demands further additions, until at last we have the system of today.

After 15 years of talk and conversation, of incessant propaganda by Mr. Altmeyer and those employed by him, we have fewer than 20 percent of our old people, 2 million out of 11½ million, beneficiaries of the so-called insurance system.

And now, to make confusion worse confounded, H. R. 6000 arrives before us, an enormous bill, 188 pages long, with 203 pages of matter from the House bill thrown in, a total of 391 pages of material.

V

What do we find? Here, briefly, are some of the points:

First. The bill enlarges the compulsory coverage of old-age and survivors insurance. Further occupational categories—not human beings, as I said, but occupational categories—are brought in, among them domestic workers and some other occupational classifications Farmers are left out, but hired men, if they work for a single employer for at least 60 days in a calendar quarter, with cash wages of at least $50 for services in the quarter, are brought in. Voluntary coverage is extended to about 1½ million State and local government employees who are presently without retirement plans. Already established plans of State and local government employees are not interfered with. New and compulsory coverage brings in 8,300,000 persons; 1,700,000 come in on the so-called voluntary basis. In sum, we may perhaps take 10,000,000 new persons on the old-age and survivors insurance rolls (pp. 5–6, Senate report).

Second. Persons in newly covered groups who will soon reach retirement age are put in a position to promptly qualify for benefits. The idea seems to be that through this quicker eligibility of older workers old-age assistance might be cut down to the same extent. That this is anything but certain I shall presently show (p. 7, Senate report).

Third. The whole scale of benefits is liberalized by an average of from 85 to 90 percent for all currently receiving old-age and survivors insurance benefits. The money for this liberalization comes from the tax income in current receipt from younger persons in the system (p. 6, Senate report).

Fourth. Old-age assistance: The Finance Committee in its release of May 5, 1950, stated that—

> The committee is of the opinion that the cost to the Federal Government for public assistance (this, of course, includes aid to dependent children and the blind) should not be increased further by modifying the existing matching formulas and establishing a new State-Federal program as would be provided by the House-approved bill.

Actually (p. 9, Senate report) existing law is retained except that where an old person gets so meager an OASI benefit that he can qualify for old-age assistance also, the Federal Government will match only 50–50 up to the $50-a-month OAA maximum. All this means is that in the past, in these particular cases, the Federal Government could pay $30 out of the first $50 of old-age assistance. Now, in these cases—and these double-jointed cases only—the Federal Government will pay no more than $25. Otherwise, the matching formula is left intact.

Fifth. The Finance Committee has declined to change the tax base, leaving it on the first $3,000 a covered person earns. But the tax on this base is supposed to rise with considerable speed. The tax, divided equally between employer and employee, is now 3 percent. If not frozen, it will rise to 4 percent in 1956; 5 percent in 1960; 6 percent in 1965, and, at length, to 6.5 percent in 1970 two decades from now.

VI

Let us now turn for a few minutes to the Senate Finance Committee's report on the bill, and see what light we can get from its 319 pages.

In the first place, we find that, as in the case of the House bill, the committee has thought it proper not to consider the many requests for a complete revamping of the system, and has not recognized the necessity for adopting a truly currently functioning program.

The senior Senator from Nebraska clearly recognizes this, and states in his minority views (p. 313):

> The committee has not attempted to make an analysis of the fundamental basis of our so-called social-security system. Although there was some discussion of making such a study and considering alternative methods of meeting the need, the committee, in effect, decided against taking such action this year. Instead, it was content to accept the present system substantially as it stands; revise the tax and benefit scale; patch up some of the inadequacies; attempt to fill some of the more glaring loopholes; and report a bill which will merely push us further along a course which I believe to be unwise.

In other words, what H. R. 6000 does is to get us deeper into confusion and contradiction. Even the majority seem to have a glimmer of this. They say in their report (p. 1):

> The onrush of broad social and economic developments has completely unbalanced the Nation's social-security system.

They further say (p. 2):

Your committee's impelling concern in recommending passage of H. R. 6000, as revised, has been to take immediate, effective steps to cut down the need for further expansion of public assistance, particularly old-age assistance.

The committee must have been misled by the Social Security Administration. Certainly the definite recognition—and the report so recognizes it on page 9—that people will draw benefits from both systems simultaneously scarcely tends to reduce expenditures for old-age assistance. On the contrary, this sort of open advertisement is an encouragement to boost old-age-assistance costs.

True enough, the report recognizes that the present indigent aged, uncovered by OASI, must inevitably be forced into assistance. But the report on page 2 goes on to say:

Your committee has not been able to arrive at definite conclusions on this problem in the time available for the consideration of H. R. 6000.

In other words, basic study has not been given to the problem. More than a year ago former President Hoover warned the House Ways and Means Committee that at least a year of independent study would be needed. His warning went unheeded, and the unhappy results of this neglect are now before us.

We find also a strange statement on page 3 of the report, in the section on Purpose and Scope of the Bill. This is a reference to private-pension plans, which have attracted so much recent attention in collective-bargaining agreements. Says the report, in discussing the disadvantages of these plans:

Most of these plans do not give the worker rights which he can take with him from job to job.

If this statement is a reflection of the Social Security Administration's thinking, it marks a high point in cynicism. Commissioner Altmeyer knows perfectly well that, even if H. R. 6000 is passed, people can be moved in and out of OASI without taking their benefit rights with them.

Numerous weird arguments turn up in the discussion of extended coverage. For example, coverage is extended to the Virgin Islands at once and to Puerto Rico if the Puerto Rican Legislature so requests. Says the report on page 17:

Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are a part of our American economy, and their populations are clearly in need of social-insurance protection. As a result of relatively low average earnings, workers there are generally unable to provide for their own future security.

The implication of this passage would seem to be that many of our high-wage people here at home could provide for their future security; but this possibility is never mentioned. Furthermore, this concern about the plight of Puerto Ricans and Virgin Islanders seems remarkable when it is recalled that millions of our own old people are shut out.

Some self-employed persons are compulsorily taken in, others are left out. Publishers are covered, but not certified public accountants; actors, but not dentists; chemists, but not physicians; musicians, but not professional engineers. The way the coverage among the self-employed might apply in a city block has been described this way:

Let us imagine a city block of stores and offices occupied in the following manner: The first office is occupied by a physician. Next door is a bakery. Then comes an office occupied by an architect. Next to him is a small millinery shop. Beyond that is a dentist's office, followed by a florist. The next office houses a lawyer. On the corner is a filling station. The tax collector skips the doctor, the architect, the dentist, and the lawyer, but picks up $67.50 each from the baker, the milliner, the florist, and the owner of the filling station. The four who are taxed are probably less able to part with the money than the four who go scot free. None of the eight would be particularly likely to claim old-age-insurance benefits at age 65. We thus have the anomalous and unfair situation in which half the operators of small independent businesses on a block would be taxed, half would not. There is no justice, no logic in the arrangement. Presumably milliners, florists, bakers, and the like are not so well organized and not so vocal as doctors. But are taxes to be laid on the weak and unprotected, while the strong escape by clamoring? (Challenge to Socialism, p. 2, June 1, 1950.)

VII

As I have stated, the OASI benefits are raised in the bill in a highly varying degree. On the average those who are now receiving benefits—about 2,000,000 persons—will get from 85 to 90 percent more than they are getting now. The average primary benefit, now $26 a month for retired workers, would be increased to an average somewhere around $48 (p. 6). These increases, as I said, will be paid out of current security tax revenues.

Now for the new categories, and they are of considerable concern, to the Senator from Washington, anyway. Younger people just coming in may require as much as 40 calendar quarters of coverage, earning $50 or more during a quarter. The self-employed, a more high-toned crowd, must have at least $100 a quarter in order to be covered.

But since there are numerous old people still at work and not far from 65, some way has got to be found to permit them to qualify quickly. So any person 62 years or over on the effective date of the bill would be fully insured for benefits at age 65 if he had at least six quarters of coverage acquired at any time.

Through such methods of operation the Social Security Administration figures that "about 700,000 additional persons would be paid benefits in the first year of operation, thus reducing the need for public assistance by the States."

Whether this reduction of need is referring to the reduction in Federal subsidy of $5 a customer for those who manage to get both OASI and old-age assistance is not clear. But it may well be. Looked at, first blush, it would appear that the Siamese-twin system simply proposed to move 700,000 persons out of old-age assistance and into OASI. But such a performance, done with mirrors, seems hardly possible even for Mr. Altmeyer's expert scene shifters.

It does seem likely, however, that this claim for a reduction in assistance payments does have some reference to that altered part of the matching formula which reduces the Federal subsidy, $5 a customer, for those who manage to get both OASI and old-age assistance.

But that this new first-year crowd of 700,000 means any real reduction in old-age assistance costs I do not believe for a minute. There may be an occasional dip in these costs. There was, as I understand, a decline of four-tenths of 1 percent in the total Federal subsidy in February 1950.

But such intermittent variations in the curve can hardly alter the steady climb. A case turned up last April of old-age-assistance payments of $568 a month. There may be many hidden items in that case that we do not know about, but it happened.

VIII

Let us have a bald look ourselves. We have about 11,500,000 persons 65 years and over in the country now. We have 2,000,000 persons getting OASI benefits and we have 2,700,000 getting old-age assistance. That is a total of 4,700,000. Now if there are taken on 700,000 new OASI beneficiaries in the next year, and for the sake of argument let us say that none come from old-age assistance, we will have a maximum of 5,400,000 persons receiving money from OASI or OAA. In other words, almost half the people 65 years and over in America will still be left out of consideration.

What about those who are not being given other consideration or benefits today, Mr. President? We simply do not have an answer to that question. We are supposed for the moment—and I presume we must do so—quietly to forget about them. But now let us turn around and look what is ahead of OASI. As I have said, these arbitrarily increased benefits will be currently paid out of social-security tax revenues. According to the trustees' report of 1950, there were more than $11,000,000,000 worth of Government bonds in the trust fund on June 30, 1949. The taxpayers can worry about those bonds, I might suggest, so there is no immediate strain on the system.

If H. R. 6000 passes, as certainly it will do next Tuesday, there are certain things we ought to bear in mind. As I understand the figure to be, we will be paying OASI benefits to 2,700,000 persons only during the coming year. But as the coverage extends and as the number of insured who reach retirement age and claim benefits increases, then the threat of some real trouble for all of us comes.

Every member of the committee with whom I have discussed this question has quite frankly admitted the possibility of financial trouble in the years to come. But it is the sincere hope of the members of the committee and other Members of the Senate that the problem will have been solved before the system is overcome with trouble.

SIX OR SEVEN MILLION AGED NOT COVERED

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. Did I correctly understand the distinguished Senator from Washington to say that even this new social-security bill would not reach any of the existing six or seven or eight million people who are 65 or over at this time who are not under the old bill—I presume because they have not paid into the fund, and that there is no provision for them?

Mr. CAIN. The understanding of the junior Senator from Washington is that when the present social-security system, which includes old-age insurance and survivors benefits and financial assistance programs in the State, has been agreed to by the Congress, there will yet be from five to six million aged Americans, each 65 or older, who will be receiving financial assistance and/or benefits from no source, either Federal or State.

MAXIMUM SOCIAL-SECURITY SYSTEM WILL STAND

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. MALONE. The junior Senator from Nevada is for the maximum of social security that the economic system will stand without undue pressure or dislocation. Has the distinguished Senator from Washington heard any discussion or does he know of any study as to what this plan might do to the economic system which I think the distinguished Senator from Washington would agree with the junior Senator from Nevada is not too sound at the moment? It seems to me that should be the first consideration; then, with that in mind, we should go just as far as we can go in including the remainder of the aged persons—65 or over.

Mr. CAIN. In the past several days some of the finest Americans in the land, who are Senators of the United States, from both political parties, have publicly stated that the present system, whether left as it is or whether it is expanded or liberalized, frightens them, and that they look forward to the time in the near future when the present system can be replaced by a system which pays for itself on a current or annual basis. There is a ready admission—I think I state the point correctly—on the part of some of the members of the Finance Committee, that there will be no dangerous economic strain, or no dangerous financial strain, on our Nation's economy with reference to the proposed extension and liberalization of the present social-security system for the next 4 or 5 years. I cannot remember at the minute how many million Americans are actually covered by the system and pay into it, but we know that figure is many million persons more than are drawing benefits at this time.

That, I think, is one of the reasons why the chief defenders of H. R. 6000, as revised, urge us to pass the bill at this time. Those gentlemen are sincerely of the opinion, I take it, that there is time remaining in which we can secure a different system before the Nation is seriously disturbed by the defects, the faults, and the inequities inherent in the social-security system now in operation.

SYSTEM NEITHER INSURANCE NOR PENSION

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MALONE. Then, recognizing, as the distinguished Senator from Washington has already explained, that this particular system never has been and is not now either fish or fowl; that it is neither insurance, such as that into which one pays an amount somewhat comparable to that which will on the average, be paid out to the beneficiary, plus interest, nor is it altogether a pension; but is a hybrid thing. Has the junior Senator from Washington seen a breakdown and study sufficient to convince him that it will be 3 or 4 years before the system becomes effective? The junior Senator from Nevada has not seen any such study.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington has seen no figures. He has merely done some work with his own pencil. He has taken the number of people who pay into the system, and the amounts they pay, and he has considered the number of people who are to benefit from the system, and because the system is taking in currently much more money than it can use, it is just as easy as we are making it easy, among other things to increase the benefits.

The trouble will come when either the benefits become too high or there no longer is sufficient money coming in to satisfy the obligations. The best thinking I know of in the country is that after H. R. 6000, as amended, has been approved and becomes the law, in 5 or 6 years we simply will not then be able to have enough payers into the system to pay out the obligations so rightfully to be demanded by the beneficiaries of the system, which is another way of saying that everyone is in agreement, whether we are for or against H. R. 6000, as revised, that we better get rid of the system we have at the earliest possible moment if we want to keep it from becoming financially involved in a serious way, and if we want to keep faith with the aged people of America.

Will my friend from Nevada permit this most frank observation? I think that those of us who are endeavoring constructively to criticize this proposed legislation can only hope at this session of the Congress to achieve two things. The first is that we will be able to advise the American Nation, including its aged population, of what America's social-security system can never do for millions of them if they live to be a million years of age. Secondly, we might so dramatize the weaknesses and the faults and the inequities included in the system which is now before us for discussion, that more Senators will be determined to find an equitable system to replace a system which was well-intentioned, to my mind, from the beginning, but which has on the basis of performance outlived its usefulness and failed to realize the objective laid down for it in 1935.

BOND PURCHASES

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MALONE. The explanation of the distinguished Senator from Washington is very clear so far as he goes. But what happens to the money that piles up in the Treasury or elsewhere? It is not, as I understand, invested in real property or in any manner invested so that there is a return on the money, as there is on insurance funds, as such funds usually are invested. But is paid into the United States Treasury, and presumably from what the junior Senator from Nevada understands is, to a large extent, used to buy Government bonds.

Mr. CAIN. I think the Senator from Nevada is quite right. I may state it another way. X number of dollars come into the social-security fund. They are turned over to the Government to be used for satisfying current obligations, and so on. They are replaced by Government bonds with a maturity which in due time, when the due date has been reached, must be picked up by the Federal Treasury.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. CAIN. Certainly.

DOUBLE TAXATION FOR BENEFITS

Mr. MALONE. It seems a little confusing to the junior Senator from Nevada that we tax certain citizens who are currently on payrolls, 1½ or 2 percent—and I understand the tax increases as the pay increases—and tax from the employer so much, all of which goes into the Treasury. We then buy bonds with that money and pay interest on the bonds. The interest on the bonds is paid by the taxpayers. Then, when the time comes that payment must be made, we cash the bonds, presumably, in order to obtain the money. But when the bonds are cashed we immediately have to sell more bonds to make up the deficit. So, perhaps what actually happens is, we merely assess the taxpayers at the moment and pay currently what we have to pay. It finally featheredges out into the twilight zone, and it is very difficult to determine who is paying for what, and when.

The junior Senator from Nevada has heard no adequate explanation as yet of just how these funds are handled and what effect the process has on the employee and the employer, who are also taxpayers, with whom it finally catches up, the second time. It looks more like a double payment system. Can the junior Senator from Washington enlighten the junior Senator from Nevada on this point?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington believes he can help the Senator's thinking perhaps a little bit. To my mind, the thought of the Senator from Nevada with reference to this so-called trust fund is substantially correct. I myself cannot forget that yesterday I listened to a man who is extremely intelligent and very thoughtful, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, who advised the Senate and the Congress that the sooner we could get away from a reserve fund which was not truly a funded operation, the better off the country would be. He then continued, saying substantially this: "But what we have in the form of a trust fund is a fake." The Senator used that word—f-a-k-e.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. When I have finished this point, if it is then the wish of the Senator from Arizona, I shall be very pleased to yield to him. I urge the Senator from Nevada—and this is what the Senator from Washington likewise wishes to do—when first we have an opportunity which will be soon, either this afternoon or tomorrow, to pose either to the Senator from Georgia, who would be pleased to answer it, or to the Senator from Colorado, who likewise would be pleased to talk to us about the question which concerns us both at the moment, namely, What is the true nature and the ultimate future of the so-called social security trust fund, if it is not to be replaced shortly by some other method of operation?

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 2440) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

Mr. CAIN. I now yield to the Senator from Arizona.

STUDY AND INVESTIGATION OF SOCIAL-SECURITY PROGRAMS

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield? I should like to ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution and explain its general nature, if I may.

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, in the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the pending bill it was provided that there shall be included a vote on a resolution sanctioned by the Senate Committee on Finance and to be offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], authorizing and directing that said committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall continue the study and investigation of social-security problems in the United States on general and specific subjects to be described in said resolution, and so forth.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That, for the purpose of assisting the Senate in dealing with legislation relating to social security hereafter originating in the House of Representatives, under the requirements of the Constitution, the Committee on Finance or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation of social-security programs with a view toward ascertaining what further changes should be made in the laws of the United States relating to social security.

The Committee on Finance shall determine the scope of said study and investigation, and without limitation thereon the following shall be included:

1. The type of social-security programs which are most consistent with the needs of the people of the United States and with our economic system, including study and investigation of proposed programs for a pay-as-you-go universal coverage system and the problems of transition to such a system.

2. The extension of coverage under the old-age and survivors insurance program to farm operators and nonregularly employed agricultural labor and to other uncovered workers with a minimum burden of record-keeping and report-making imposed upon such farm operators and the employers of such other uncovered workers.

3. Financing of the old-age and survivors insurance program particularly with respect to the issue of reserve financing as opposed to a pay-as-you-go plan.

4. Increased work opportunities for the aged who are able and willing to work.

5. The relationship of the social-security programs to private pension plans.

6. The social-security programs in relation to care, income, maintenance, and rehabilitation of disabled workers.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee or the subcommittee thereof duly authorized to conduct the study and investigation under this resolution is authorized to employ such technical, clerical, and other assistants as it deems advisable and to designate and appoint advisors.

SEC. 3. The committee or the subcommittee thereof duly authorized to conduct the study and investigation under this resolution is authorized, with the approval of the Committee on Rules and Administration, to request the use of the services, information, facilities, and personnel of the departments and agencies in the executive branch of the Government in the performance of its duties under this resolution.

SEC. 4. The expenses of the committee or subcommittee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $25,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and myself I submit the resolution and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I do not believe it is necessary for the resolution to be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Committee on Finance must pass on the resolution.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Then may I have it referred to the Committee on Finance?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). The unanimous-consent agreement entered into yesterday referred to the fact that a resolution would be introduced "sanctioned by the Senate Committee on Finance, and to be offered by Senators GEORGE and MILLIKIN," and that it would be received and voted on on next Tuesday.

Mr. TAFT. What I was concerned about was that the rules of the Senate require the Committee on Rules and Administration to pass on any resolution which provides an allowance of $25,000.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It is mentioned in the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion, on the advice of the Parliamentarian, that the unanimous-consent agreement in that respect suspends the rule.

Mr. TAFT. It is entirely satisfactory to me. I merely did not want the resolution to lie on the table if it had to go through two committees before it could be voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is the order of the Chair that the resolution lie on the table until next Tuesday, at which time it will be voted on.

The resolution (S. Res. 300) was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, announcement was made earlier in the day that at about this hour an effort would be made to consider the conference report on the bill (H. R. 2143) to amend the Hatch Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield for that purpose?

Mr. CAIN. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. CAIN. I would be most willing to yield for that purpose, according to the agreement reached earlier in the day. Would it be possible to have the proceedings on that question placed in the RECORD following the presentation now being made on the pending bill?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is understood that the Senator from Washington will resume the floor as soon as this matter is disposed of. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask that the conference report on the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act be submitted, and I move that the Senate proceed to consider it.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I submit the conference report on House bill 1243, to amend the Hatch Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following: "That section 9 of the Act entitled 'An Act to prevent pernicious political activities', approved August 2, 1939, is amended by striking out subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following subsections:

"'(b) If in the case of any person violating the provisions of this section it is found by the United States Civil Service Commission that such violation warrants removal he shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any Act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person. If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission: Provided, That in no case shall the penalty be less than thirty days suspension without pay: Pro- vided further, That in the case of any person who has heretofore been removed from the service under the provisions of this section, the Commission shall upon request reopen and reconsider the record in such case. If it shall find by a unanimous vote that the acts committed were such as to warrant a penalty of less than removal it shall issue an order revoking the restriction against reemployment in the position from which removed, or in any other position for which he may be qualified.

"'(c) At the end of each fiscal year the Commission shall report to the President for transmittal to the Congress the names, addresses, and nature of employment of all persons with respect to whom action has been taken by the Commission under the terms of this section, with a statement of the facts upon which action was taken, and the penalty imposed.

"'(d) Records containing testimony or other evidence relevant to charges and allegations of a violation or violations of this Act in proceedings had pursuant to this section shall be made available to either the Senate or the House of Representatives upon the request of any committee thereof.'

"SEC. 2. Section 16 of such Act is amended by striking out 'to the extent the Commission deems to be in the domestic interest of such persons' and inserting in lieu thereof a colon and the following: 'Provided, That no regulations promulgated under this section permitting any person to take part in political management or political campaigns shall impose any restrictions on his doing so through the medium of any political organization or political party of his own choosing, including participation as an individual, candidate or manager in primaries, conventions, caucuses, or meetings of any such political organization or political party'.

"SEC. 3. Section 612 of title 18, United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'§ 612. Publication or distribution of political statements

"'Whoever willfully publishes or distributes, or for the purpose of publishing or distributing the same, knowingly deposits for mailing or delivery, or knowingly transports in interstate commerce any card, pamphlet, circular, poster, dodger, advertisement, writing, or other statement relating to or concerning any person who has publicly declared his intention to seek the office of President, or Vice President of the United States, or Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress, in a primary, general, or special election, or convention of a political party, or has caused or permitted his intention to do so to be publicly declared, which does not contain the names of the persons, associations, committees, and corporations responsible for the publication or distribution of the same, and the names of the officers of each such association, committee, or corporation, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN C. STENNIS,
G. M. GILLETTE,
ANDREW F. SCHOEPPEL,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.
BURR P. HARRISON,
CHASE GOING WOODHOUSE,
K. M. LECOMPTE,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I made this motion because I am chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, which——

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, has the motion been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the conference report.

Mr. HAYDEN. I wanted to explain that I made this motion on behalf of the Committee on Rules and Administration, which handled the bill. I was not a member of the conference committee, but there are two members of the conference committee present, and I suggest that they explain the report to the Senate.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	Maybank
Benton	Hickenlooper	Millikin
Brewster	Hill	Mundt
Bricker	Holland	Myers
Bridges	Humphrey	Neely
Butler	Hunt	O'Mahoney

Gurney	Malone
Hayden	Martin

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERR in the chair). A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I have prepared a statement which covers the major points involved in the conference report, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD at this point. Then I shall proceed to discuss certain major points in the report itself.

There being no objection, the statement of Mr. STENNIS was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR STENNIS

The Senate conferees, in arriving at an agreement with the House managers on the provisions of the measure (H. R. 1243), entitled "An act to amend the Hatch act," have for the most part retained the substance of provisions added to it by the Senate and, accordingly, have now recommended to the Senate that the conference report on this bill be agreed to.

It should be noted that the original purpose of this bill was to amend section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act in order to eliminate certain injustices resulting from its present rigid construction. Section 9 (b), as it is now written, makes no provision for the exercise of discretion by the Civil Service Commission in the dismissal of Government employees for political activity. Instead, it imposes upon the Commission the duty to remove any violator of the Hatch Act from the position or office held by him regardless of the triviality of the offense or of the circumstances surrounding its commission. It is the intent of both Houses to amend section 9 (b) to provide for the imposition of penalties commensurate with the degree of the offense and to permit the Commission, upon request, to reopen and reconsider the records in cases of persons who have heretofore been removed from the service under the provisions of this section. Also, this section, as amended, will now provide the Civil Service Commission with a certain latitude of discretion in its determination of the degree of the offense and of the penalty to be imposed in each particular case. This latitude of discretion has one very important limitation which has been attached thereto by the Senate and which the committee on conference recommends unanimously, namely, that before a lesser penalty can be imposed for a violation of the Hatch Act the Civil Service Commission must find, by unanimous vote, that such violation does not warrant removal.

In the Senate version of the act a minimum penalty of 60 days suspension from duty was required where the Commission, in its discretion, decided to grant a penalty less than removal from office. The Senate conferees, together with the House managers, agreed that some minimum should be placed on the penalty to be imposed but, after full consideration of all the resultant hardships to minor violators, it was decided that a minimum of 30 days suspension from duty without pay would suffice as a penalty in many instances.

The Senate conferees, together with the House managers, after much deliberation and upon the advice of the Civil Service Commission, also agreed unanimously to eliminate the phrase "after hearing" added by the Senate to section 1. If these words were retained it would be mandatory for the Civil Service Commission to hold hearings in all cases which would entail the useless expenditure of funds in minor cases, now nearly always settled or administered by mail. Furthermore, the Commission would be confronted with administrative problems complicated by the impotence of the Commission to subpena alleged violators and witnesses. Hence the Commission, in conducting an investigation, would be forced to send personnel into the field whenever an accused violator refused to come to Washington, D. C., and, of course, would have no legal power or right to subpena witnesses who might be necessary in a full development of such investigation.

After much consideration, the Senate conferees and House managers also agreed to eliminate the words "not willful" added by Senate amendment to the bill as being administratively impracticable.

The Civil Service Commission has pointed out that, according to the legal interpretation of the phrase, in all the cases it has reviewed in the past 10 years only two or three could be classified as being "not willful." Thus, if this phrase should remain in the act the primary purpose of the legislation would be nullified. The Commission would not, under such provision, be able to assess a lesser penalty in more than three or four cases a decade. The whole purpose of the first part of this bill, to make future punishments fit the violations, would in the greater sense be set aside and leave the adoption of this conference report almost an empty and useless act on the part of Congress. There would be no point in granting the Commission discretionary power to prescribe a lesser penalty if few opportunities henceforth could be given it for the exercisement of that discretion.

The Commission has stated quite clearly that a Government employee is given little leeway to commit a political act which is "not willful." What is permissible and not permissible in politics is printed on the affidavit which a person signs to enter Government employ. He is surrounded by bulletin boards carrying warnings against certain types of political action. He is told that all persons within the scope of the political-activity statutes must take the responsibility to see that their acts do not offend such laws, and if he has doubts he must resolve them first by inquiry to the Commission or his superior before acting.

However, it is the consensus of the Senate conferees and the House managers that the Civil Service Commission should consider the degree of willfulness in any violation of the Hatch Act and that the penalties imposed on such violators should be based, to a very great extent, on such degree of willfulness in the commission of the violations.

The Commission cannot be excused by the terms of this conference report from taking into account the type and purpose of each violation. Where there is a gross violation of the act, or an act which shows a reckless disregard for the law, the Commission must be expected to remove the violator and not use the grant of a lesser penalty by Congress instead as the means of punishment. Not to take into consideration the motives of the violator for his political act, and to estimate his willfulness, is for the Commission to ignore the reasons and the good faith of the Senate conferees in agreeing to strike the words "not willful" from the bill.

A memorandum on the meaning of the word "willful," prepared by the American Law Section of the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress for the Committee on Rules and Administration of the United States Senate, is included in this statement at this point:

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1950.

To: Senate Committee on Rules.

Subject: Meaning of word "willful" in connection with proposed amendment to H. R. 1243.

The Supreme Court has often pointed out that "willful" is a word "of many meanings, its construction often being influenced by its context." Spies v. United States ((1943) 317 U. S. 492); United States v. Murdock ((1933) 290 U. S. 389). When used in a criminal statute, the word "generally means an act done with a bad purpose." United States v. Murdock, supra; United States v. Illinois Central R. Co. ((1938) 303 U. S. 239). This is especially true where the statute denounces an offense involving turpitude. United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra. In such cases "something more is required than the doing of the act proscribed by the statute." Screws v. United States ((1945) 325 U. S. 91). An evil motive to accomplish that which the statute condemns becomes a constituent element of the crime. Screws v. United States, supra; Spurr v. United States ((1899) 174 U. S. 728); United States v. Murdock, supra. In other words, actual knowledge of the existence of obligation and a wrongful intention to evade it is of the essence. Hargrove v. United States ((C. C. A. 5th, 1933) 67 F. (2d) 820), and cases cited. And the issue must be submitted to the jury under appropriate instructions. United States v. Ragen ((1942) 314 U. S. 513); Screws v. United States, supra.

On the other hand, in statutes denouncing actions not in themselves wrong, the word "willful" is "often used without any such implication." United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra. It often denotes simply that which is "intentional, or knowing, or voluntary, as distinct from accidental" and may be employed to characterize conduct "marked by careless disregard whether or not one has the right so to act." United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; United States v. Murdock, supra. See also Screws v. United States, supra. That is, where the actor, having a free will or a choice, either intentionally disregards the statute or is plainly indifferent to its requirements, he may be said to have acted willfully. United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; United States v. Murdock, supra. It should be noted, however, that in criminal statutes such as those relating to the payment of taxes, the Supreme Court has generally construed the word "willful" as requiring an evil motive. See United States v. Murdock, supra; Spies v. United States, supra; United States v. Hargrove, supra, and cases cited.

In the amendment here under scrutiny [see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, January 19, 1950, pp. 623–624] the provision dealt with is section 9 of the Hatch Act as proposed to be amended. This section denounces certain political activities of Government officers or employees as unlawful and prescribes as a penalty the loss or deprivation of employment. This, then, is not a criminal statute of the usual kind imposing a fine or imprisonment or both for its violation. Therefore, since in addition the activities proscribed are generally lawful and do not necessarily involve turpitude, it is at least open to argument that the word "willful" as used in this connection with regard to violations would be interpreted in the sense indicated in the second paragraph of this memorandum.

In any event, a court would endeavor to give that construction to the word which would give effect to the purpose of the Hatch Act to curtail undesirable political activity on the part of Government officers and employees. See United States v. Illinois Central R. Co., supra; United Public Works of America v. Mitchell ((1947) 330 U. S. 75).

ROBERT S. OGLEBAY,
American Law Section.

The Senate conferees also agreed to certain changes in section (d) of the bill which relates to the availability of testimony of hearings on violations held before the Civil Service Commission. In the bill, as it passed the Senate, the language of section (d) is rather broad and might conceivably be interpreted as imposing upon the Civil Service Commission the duty to have all testimony in all hearings transcribed, whether the occasion demands such an expense or not. It also imposes on the Civil Service Commission the duty to make such transcribed testimony available to congressional committees regardless of its relevancy or materiality. This the conferees have attempted to correct by refraining to impose a duty to have all testimony transcribed and by limiting the testimony available to the congressional committees to that which is relevant and material to the charges and allegations of the violations.

Under the Senate version of the bill the Civil Service Commission is required to report to the Congress at the end of each calendar month the names, addresses, and nature of employment of all persons with respect to whom action has been taken by the Commission under the terms of the act, with a statement of the facts upon which action was taken and the penalty imposed. The conferees agreed that to require the Civil Service Commission to report on these matters every month was an unnecessary imposition. Since there is no particular secrecy surrounding this information Congress may now obtain it if it wishes. However, the conferees, in an attempt to carry out the intent of the Senate, have insisted upon an inclusion of this information in the annual report of the Commission submitted to the President for transmittal to the Congress.

The purposes of section 2 are retained by the conferees notwithstanding the fact that the language of the bill, as passed by the Senate, has been considerably modified by this report.

Under section 16 of the Hatch Act, as it now stands, the Civil Service Commission has discretion to issue regulations permitting Federal employees who reside in the immediate vicinity of the National Capital actively to participate in political management or political campaigns involving the election of officials on a county or municipal level. This same right is extended to employees in communities elsewhere in the United States which have as their citizens a substantial number of Government employees.

The Commission's regulations now in effect permit an employee of the Government in the above designated areas to participate as a candidate, or to act on behalf of a candidate for municipal or county offices, only as an independent or on a nonpartisan basis. This has resulted, in the opinion of the conferees, in some unfairness to Federal employees living in such areas who, as members of established political parties, are denied by the regulations from acting in elections affecting their communities. It is especially true where these employees, who are in the majority in their particular counties, must suppress their activity for an official if he is running on a partisan ticket.

This report, as the Senate intended, therefore proposes that a Government employee residing in a nearby area or living in a locality predominately Federal may participate in a local election on a partisan basis. The Commission is left with the duty of issuing regulations controlling such participation provided they do not inhibit the activity of anyone as a member of a regularly established political party. No one will be denied participation in local elections as a nonpartisan. Neither will anyone be denied activity while a member of a national political organization not otherwise barred to Federal employees by law. The language of the report here retains all the precedents and existing rights of the Commission in this matter, while denying to the Commission the power to promulgate regulations which would penalize an employee who wishes to work for his own party on a county or municipal level.

The Senate conferees have also agreed to a redraft of section 3 of the bill so that it substantially incorporates the language of the law as it is today, which has been interpreted judicially on many occasions and under which the Federal Government has been prosecuting offenses for several years. On the advice of the Department of Justice it was also agreed to change the Senate amendment in regard to the fines to be imposed for the particular offenses from $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both, to $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both. It was determined that as a matter of practice, rather than principle, the Federal prosecutors would be able to obtain convictions more readily if the severity of the punishment was not too great.

Mr. STENNIS. As every Senator knows, the present law provides that for any violation of the so-called Hatch Act the penalty shall be an absolute removal from the position held by the offender. This bill originated in the House and was designed merely to make it possible for the Civil Service Commission in so-called minor cases to impose a lesser penalty than absolute removal. It vested in the Commission the discretionary power so to act. The bill was amended in the Senate so as to vest the Commission with authority to impose a lesser penalty provided there was a unanimous verdict on that point by the Civil Service Commission. Since the Commission is a bipartisan board, the idea was advanced by the junior Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] that that fact would eliminate any tendency which might otherwise arise toward a partisan consideration of the question involved. It was agreed in conference that if there was a unanimous vote a penalty less than removal could be imposed, provided the penalty was not less than 30 days' suspension without pay. The provision adopted by the Senate called for a 60-day suspension without pay. In conference, as I have said, the provision was changed to 30 days.

As the Senate passed the bill it contained the words "after hearing" in all cases. The conferees found that provision to be somewhat impractical and to involve a very expensive procedure. We found that in practice at the present time when a hearing is requested it is always granted. Therefore that provision was eliminated by agreement.

The words "not willful" were also in the bill as passed by the Senate, providing that the lesser penalty could be imposed when the act complained of was not willful. We found that in criminal law that term would cover practically everything in all the cases that had been complained of in more than 10 years of the operation of the act. Therefore we thought it was too broad a term. As the statement shows and the report will reflect, we thought that in the case of a gross violation of the act or a reckless disregard of the law the Commission must be expected to remove the violator and not impose a lesser penalty. Incidentally, the report of the conferees is unanimous on the part of the House conferees and the Senate conferees. The Senate conferees were the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and myself.

A provision in the bill as passed by the Senate provided for reports to be filed and the evidence to be available. That provision was changed to read that reports would be available as to such relevant testimony as may have been taken regarding the charges. In the conference report provision is made for an annual report to be filed.

There is another new section with respect to the penalty that shall be imposed on anyone who circulates or puts in the mail any false accusations in a political campaign unless they are signed and their source shown. That was worked out by providing a thousand dollar fine and a 1 year jail sentence, either or both, or any part of both.

I come now to an altogether different phase of the report. The Senate amendment carried a provision with reference to Federal employees in the States of Virginia and Maryland, particularly those living in the vicinity of Washington, D. C. The original Hatch Act did not permit such employees to take part in any campaign or in any election in any way even on a local level. About 1 year after the Hatch Act was passed an amendment was made to it which adopted the old procedure which had been in effect in the Civil Service Commission for many years, under which the Commission allowed Federal employees to take part in such elections provided their activities were absolutely nonpartisan. This practice of the Civil Service Commission was embodied in an amendment to the Hatch Act 1 year after the act was passed. Acting under that authority the Civil Service Commission again brought forward their rule, under which the employees of the Federal Government affected can now take part in local elections, but cannot take part as members of any party. In other words, they are precluded in their political activities on a local level from lining up with the Republican Party, the Democratic Party, or any other party.

The position of the Committee on Rules and Administration and the Senate when it passed the bill was that that was an unreasonable limitation upon their activities. It was thought that if they are to be allowed to take part at all in elections on a local level they should be permitted to take part whether as members of a party or outside of a party.

Mr. President, this proved to be a rather complex and intricate problem, and it was very difficult to work out definitely and write down in the law a rule that would cover all the different contingencies. So finally it was decided to follow the present law, leaving the present authority in the Civil Service Commissioners, except that they would be prohibited from imposing the restriction as to party on the activities of the employees. In other words, the amendment provides that the Civil Service Commissioners may promulgate the rules as heretofore, but they shall not impose the limitation that the employees cannot take part in local party primaries and elections as members of a party. If they are to be allowed to take part at all, it must be without limitation as to party.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. KILGORE. Is it not an actual fact that in most local elections, or a great portion of them, the names of the candidates, even though the election is a purely municipal affair, are under the designation of one of the major parties, and therefore the employees would be precluded, except in the case of what is called a nonpartisan election, say for councilman, such as occurs in Cincinnati? Is not that a fact?

Mr. STENNIS. I am not sure I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. KILGORE. In most cities, in local elections the candidates' names are set out on the party tickets.

Mr. STENNIS. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. It would be in only a few situations, where there are elections to nonpartisan councils, or nonpartisan boards of education, in which a Federal employee would be able to participate under the old rule where as under the proposed rule he could go in and vote on local questions, in which he might have a very vital interest, without getting into national politics on any scale, although the party might be called the Democratic or the Republican Party on the local level.

Mr. STENNIS. I believe the Senator is correct. The limitation was considered to be an unwarranted one. The citizen should not be told that he should stay out of any particular party, because that is for him to decide.

Section 16 as the bill is now written applies to contiguous areas around the District of Columbia, which includes Arlington, Fairfax County, Va.; Montgomery County and Prince Georges County, Md., and perhaps a few other places in Maryland. It does not include Oak Ridge, Tenn., as there is a special law covering related questions for Oak Ridge. We simply did not go into that, but left the present law as it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, under the present law Oak Ridge is governed by a New York corporation, and that corporation is licensing all the activities of the usual city government. I am very sorry the Senator or the committee left the amendment out.

Mr. STENNIS. The conferees were very sorry to leave this matter uncovered, but Oak Ridge is more or less a Federal city, governed, up until now, under a special law designed especially for it. Our idea was that the law should not be changed, and that the case of Oak Ridge should be separated from the problems immediately attending the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall certainly introduce a bill to correct the situation affecting Oak Ridge. I offered the amendment, which was agreed to, and I am very regretful that the committee saw fit to leave it out.

Mr. STENNIS. The conferees regretted very much that they could not cover that matter.

Mr. President, I believe my statement covers the main points.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STENNIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I refer the Senator to the language appearing on the first page of the conference report, and ask him if he does not think it is much more defective than the language in the bill passed by the Senate. In effect the conferees took the House language, which reads as follows:

> If in the case of any person violating the provisions of this section it is found by the United States Civil Service Commission that such violation warrants removal—

It is entirely in their discretion, and there is no suggestion of any standard that I can see—> he shall be immediately removed.

The next sentence reads:

> If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission.

It seems to me that if the Commission is split there will be no penalty imposed, under the provisions of the report. Suppose one of the Commissioners thought an act warranted removal, and two thought it did not. Under those circumstances the employee would not be removed. It would not be possible to get a unanimous vote, under those circumstances, to find that the violation did not warrant removal. Nothing would be done, and no penalty would be imposed for the violation of the Hatch Act.

Mr. STENNIS. I hardly think such a situation as that would arise, or that it could arise, although the language is somewhat awkward, in my opinion. The language as to removal follows the present law, I understand. Under the present law if two members of the Commission find a person guilty, he is automatically removed, and that would still be the law, I understand, unless all three of the Commissioners voted to impose a penalty less than removal.

Mr. TAFT. Let us suppose that one member thinks that a violation warrants removal, and two members think it does not. Then the first sentence would not operate, even if the second sentence should operate, and the Commission found by unanimous vote that the violation did not warrant removal. Two of the Commissioners find it does not warrant removal, one finds it does. Under those circumstances the second sentence does not operate, so there is no lesser penalty imposed. Is not that a correct interpretation of the report?

Mr. STENNIS. The Commission would have to decide. They would have to find the employee guilty or not guilty of the charges. They would have to dispose of the case one way or another, as to the employee's original guilt or innocence.

Mr. TAFT. Let me suggest to the Senator that this is not a question of guilt, it is a question of whether the penalty fits the crime. This section deals only with sentencing an employee, not finding whether he is guilty or not.

Mr. STENNIS. That is all the Commission have to do. They hear the charges, and sit more or less as a court. Then they have to determine whether an employee is guilty of the charges.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. STENNIS. There is no other section in the law or in the bill which specifically provides for a trial. This is the section under which the Commission operate, so far as finding an employee guilty is concerned. That is the effect of it. They must first determine his guilt. Under the present law, if they find him guilty, he is automatically dismissed. Under the conference report bill, they have to find him guilty or not guilty, and if all three agree that the penalty of removal is too severe, they may impose a lesser penalty.

Mr. TAFT. It is not a question of finding him guilty. The first sentence relates only to whether the violation warrants removal, not whether there is a violation, but whether the violation warrants removal. If two of the Commissioners find it is not so serious, and one thinks it is, that Commissioner cannot reverse his opinion and vote that the action of the employee does not warrant removal, when he has just voted that it does. So how can he give unanimous consent, under the second sentence, for a lesser penalty? Under those circumstances there is no penalty. I do not see why it is not a complete exemption from penalty, under those circumstances, if the Commission is split.

Mr. STENNIS. The Senator is correct in that the sentence is not drawn under the present law as a criminal statute would ordinarily be drawn. This is the procedure that was adopted in the original Hatch Act. In effect, under the present law, the Commissioners hear the evidence and in effect render a verdict of guilty or not guilty. This section in the conference report follows the present law until it gets down to the proviso about the Commission having discretionary authority by unanimous consent to impose a lesser penalty. They have already had to find the employee guilty before that question can ever arise.

Mr. President, I think I have covered the high points of the conference report, and I therefore yield the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the conference report on House bill 1243, to amend the Hatch Act. I do so because I consider the bill itself to be both contrary to good public policy and, in its present form, quite inadvisable and potentially serious and defective in its implications.

Mr. President, I have listened to the colloquy between the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], and I think that colloquy within itself demonstrated some of the looseness of the language and the confusion which will result from the conference report if it is adopted by the Senate.

I bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that 140 votes were recorded against this conference report in the House, which finally approved it by a vote of 203 to 140, and that since that vote in the House, further defects have been discovered in the bill.

The bill as it now comes before the Senate for approval differs significantly from its original form. The original bill, consisting of section 1 only, was introduced in January 1949 by Representative HUGH MITCHELL, of Washington, with the strong support of the Civil Service Commission. It was passed in the House by a voice vote without objection on February 9, 1940. It undertook a desirable improvement in the Hatch Act, authorizing the Civil Service Commission to punish violators of the Hatch Act by lesser penalties than were provided for in the original act. I recall that before the subcommittee presided over by the Senator from Mississippi I testified in behalf of section 1 of the Hatch Act. Rather than requiring the Civil Service Commission to punish violators of the Hatch Act by permanent exclusion from employment in the Federal Government, it allowed the Commission, by unanimous vote, to impose a penalty of no less than 30 days suspension without pay. The bill as it was introduced originally had merit in view of the fact that the extreme penalties originally called for made enforcement of the law quite difficult.

Mr. President, I have prepared and at a later time shall submit for the RECORD an analysis of the history of the conference report and of the original bill. At this point I should like to say that after section 1 of the bill had been adopted by the House, section 2 was added in the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. A hearing was held in that committee at which proponents of the section were allowed to testify. The first version of section 3 was added on the floor of the Senate, and the amended bill was passed by the Senate by a voice vote on January 19, 1950. The measure then went to conference. The conference committee then amended each section of the Senate bill. The amended bill was reported to the Senate by the conferees on May 3, 1950. I have noted in my remarks the vote on the conference report in the House of Representatives.

Let me say a word or two more about the bill as it is before the Senate today. It is my candid opinion that the bill as now written in conference is dangerous in that it would take away—and this point needs to be clearly understood by every Member of the Senate before he votes upon the report—that it would take away from the President of the United States a historical prerogative which has been his from the days of George Washington. Furthermore, the bill in itself is harmful to Federal Government employees.

I now direct my remarks to section 1 (d) of House bill 1243 and note that it would deprive the President of a historical prerogative. Under section 1 (d) of the bill any Congressional committee would as a matter of statutory right have access to all Civil Service Commission files relating to persons who have been accused of violating the Hatch Act.

Mr. President, I want the word "accused" noted. It does not mean that there has to be any proof. It does not mean that some sort of a preliminary hearing must be held. It simply means that if anyone wants to secure the confidential Civil Service Commission files, which include all kinds of innuendo, rumor, half-true statements and false statements, truth and fiction, all any Member of the Congress has to do is merely to make an accusation that Mr. X has violated the Hatch Act; that accusation is laid before a committee and, immediately, under the terms of the conference report, if it becomes law, the entire Civil Service Commission file, containing confidential material, must be brought before the committee which requests it. In other words, the members of the committee would have access to confidential Civil Service Commission files under the terms of the bill so long as an accusation is made that the Hatch Act has been violated.

Section 1 (d) of the bill would establish this very serious precedent, because it differs from the version passed by the Senate on January 19. The bill as originally passed by the Senate provided merely that testimony—in other words, Mr. President, testimony with regard to the particular accusation—in any hearings on violations should be available to congressional committees. The conference report, however, broadens this provision, so as to make it cover—and I quote now from the conference report itself:

> Records containing testimony or other evidence.

Mr. President, all the Presidents of the United States, beginning with President George Washington and continuing to the present President of the United States, have maintained the position that it is a matter of Presidential discretion to determine whether or not to make confidential files available to congressional committees and to determine the conditions under which such material will be available, if at all. We have recently had made available on the floor of the Senate an opportunity to discuss this principle and this question in detail. On March 4, the distinguished junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] made a very persuasive and telling speech on the floor of the Senate, concluding that it was well within the prerogatives of the executive branch of the Government to determine the conditions under which its files might be made available to the Congress. The Senator from New Mexico made a persuasive argument in regard to the nature of the separation of powers and the independence of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of the Government. The Senator from New Mexico also included, on pages 2795–2796 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1950, an opinion by the Attorney General of the United States with reference to access to executive reports and files in the possession of the executive departments. The Attorney General stated, as reported at that time by the Senator from New Mexico:

> It is the position of the Department of Justice, restated now with the approval and at the direction of the President, that all investigative reports are confidential documents of the executive department and that congressional or public access thereto would not be in the public interest.
> This accords with the conclusions reached by a long line of predecessors in the Office of Attorney General and with the position taken by the President from time to time since Washington's administration; and this discretion in the executive branch has been upheld and respected by the judiciary.

Mr. President, it appears to me that statement is rather conclusive, and goes far beyond any partisan considerations or any considerations as to the prerogatives of the legislative branch of the Government versus those of the executive branch of the Government.

If the conference report on House bill 1243 becomes law, the historic prerogative of the President would be destroyed. The enactment of this measure would mean a blanket commitment in advance to make all civil-service records available to any congressional committee in any case in which one or more Federal employees were accused of violating the Hatch Act.

Moreover, Mr. President, this measure also would provide an important precedent for the enactment of similar legislation, by giving the congressional committees a statutory right to obtain records pertaining to various matters, including, in particular, loyalty cases, something which I know the Senate of the United States is not prepared to do, if the events of recent weeks are any indication.

Section 1 (d) of the conference report is, therefore, seriously defective. I repeat that it was not in the bill as the bill was passed by the Senate in January 1950; but, on the contrary, section 1 (d) was added in the conference. Even if it were the only defect in this measure—and it is not—it is my belief that this provision alone would provide ample justification for rejection by the Senate of the conference report and, if necessary, for a Presidential veto. Mr. President, I simply cannot imagine that the President of the United States would sign a measure which would open up the confidential files of executive offices to any congressional committee which might ask for them, in view of the historic precedents or more than 150 years of American Government since the time of President George Washington.

HOUSE BILL 1243 IS HARMFUL TO FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. President, the second point I should like to stress is that House bill 1243 is harmful to Federal employees. In a very significant sense, this measure is a snare and delusion for Federal workers because, first of all, although it appears to enlarge the political rights of Federal workers, it actually would allow the Civil Service Commission the right and the authority to deny to Federal workers the right to take part in any political activities whatsoever, whether on a nonpartisan basis or on a party basis.

I think it should be noted quite carefully, Mr. President, that section 2 of the conference report leaves with the Civil Service Commission the discretionary power to allow or not to allow Federal employees to take part in local campaigns in the areas referred to in this measure. However, under section 2, if the Civil Service Commission authorized any campaign activities whatsoever for Federal employees, it would have to authorize participation in party campaigns as well as in nonpartisan activities. I think it should be noted that this measure is not simply one to permit nonpartisan participation or a measure to permit party participation; on the contrary, if there is to be authority for any participation at all, it will have to apply both to partisan and to nonpartisan participation. I submit that the discretionary power which would be left in the hands of the Civil Service Commission could mean that there would be no political participation whatsoever, even in respect to nonpartisan, local, almost noncontroversial offices and legislative matters.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, will he yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield to the Senator.

Mr. STENNIS. I understood the Senator from Minnesota to say that there was nothing on that subject matter in the hearings or in the record or the testimony in connection therewith, so far as concerns the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I said that was with respect to the matter of the files, not with respect to partisan participation or political participation. Insofar as the records of the Civil Service Commission are concerned, the bill as passed by the Senate referred only to testimony taken at hearings. However, the conference report not only would permit use of the testimony, but also would permit use of any other evidence or any other records, which means that the entire file of any individual Government employee could be made available to a congressional committee.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to invite the attention of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota to the language of subsection (d), reading as follows:

> Records containing testimony or other evidence relevant to charges—

And so forth. I say to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota that in the committee of conference, before this conference report was drawn up, there was much discussion covering the very point the distinguished Senator from Minnesota has raised, namely, that the Civil Service Commission itself should be the judge of what should be regarded as relevant, in order to prevent having brought out into the open the entire files and a great deal of irrelevant matter of one type or another which might not be pertinent to the case.

The very safeguards the Senator from Minnesota now wishes to have included in connection with this matter, I am quite sure were put into the conference report in order to prevent in the future some of the injustices mentioned and the production of some of the extraneous matters which have been bandied about. I can say in all seriousness and all candor that the word "relevant" was included as a safeguard, and certainly for no other particular reason.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the Senator for making that statement, because, of course, I am confident that the committee did give serious consideration to this change as made in the conference report.

One of my purposes in making these remarks was to obtain the kind of clarification and the kind of interpretation of the conference report and explanations regarding the legislative history of this matter which the Senator from Kansas has volunteered. As I understand the Senator from Kansas, the Civil Service Commission then would be the judge of what information it should offer, as being relevant information, to the respective Senate committee or House committee which might request information.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. That is correct. That was the discussion we had in the conference committee in reference to that matter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, to conclude in reference to H. R. 1243, I cited, first of all, that I felt that although it appears to enlarge the rights of the Federal workers, it allows the Civil Service Commission to deny Federal workers the right to take part in any political activities whatever, whether on a partisan or on a nonpartisan basis. I personally do not like to give that much power to the Civil Service Commission which, in its enforcement, one way or other, may want either to permit or not to permit the Federal worker to participate in a political campaign or in a political activity.

Secondly, it is specialized legislation dealing with a problem of high national policy on a purely localized basis. I shall refer to that later on. I recognize that this bill is primarily directed insofar as Federal officers' participation in politics is concerned to the areas of Maryland and Virginia surrounding the National capital. However, as was pointed out so appropriately by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, there are other areas of America where there are Federal workers in large numbers, who would like to have these same benefits. Those benefits were denied, for example, at Oak Ridge, Tenn., and at some of the other military and army installations, where we have a large number of civilian workers.

Thirdly, it leaves to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission to decide whether membership on a county or executive committee of the Democratic or Republican Party is a "local office"; and, fourth, it opens the lid of a Pandora's box of abuses by completely failing to provide Federal employees with needed additional protection against political coercion and discrimination.

I surely would not impugn the motives of any one person or any individual, but it is entirely possible that if the Civil Service Commission can decide whether an employee may participate in a political situation or a political campaign, and can decide whether that is partisan or nonpartisan, it is also entirely possible that the people running for office in that particular area may be able to put a certain amount of pressure upon the individual officeholders. One of the reasons for the Hatch Act was to deny people in elective public office the opportunity in any way to coerce or to use or to unduly persuade the Federal officeholder, who may be a civil servant, from participating in any political activity, or to do the bidding of any particular political officer.

Recognition that this bill is undesirable for Federal employees seems to be quite prominent among many Federal employees in parts of the country where this bill applies. I am informed by them, for example, and I see the Senator from Virginia here—that the Virginia party plan of the Virginia Democratic Party sets up a barrier to participation in local Democratic activities. Under the Virginia party plan the thousands of Democrats loyal to the national administration who voted for the nonpartisan candidate at the last election would be prevented from entering the coming Democratic primaries. I state this as a matter of my understanding, and I am willing to stand corrected. Moreover, all the Democrats who entered the primaries would have to pledge support to all the party's candidates. I am not opposed to that, as an individual. I, in a way, believe in party regularity and party uniformity, but Democrats who entered the primaries would have to pledge support to all the party's candidates.

Any Federal worker who took this pledge would, despite the pending amendment, be running the risk of discharge for having violated the Hatch Act. It appears to me there is not enough protection in the bill. I may say to my friend, the Senator from Mississippi, or to the Senator from Kansas, who was involved in the preparation of this bill, that I am making this statement in the hope that the record may be clear.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have been so busy with matters affecting appropriations during the past few weeks that I have not had time to give proper consideration to the question which is now before the Senate.

Reference has been made to the city of Oak Ridge, which, as I am informed, has a population of more than 25,000. It is being governed by a corporation, a nonresident corporation, which grants various licenses, and governs the city. When the bill was in the Senate it was amended so as to allow the people living there to be free Americans like the rest of us. That provision has been eliminated in conference. I am not saying it was improperly eliminated. I am not criticizing the Senators and Representatives who were members of the conference. I am merely stating that I hope that my colleagues will allow this report to go over until we can look into it, to see what the facts are. If the facts are as I have been told they are, I do not believe the Senate would agree to the conference report.

I ask unanimous consent that the report go over until one day next week, in order that we may be able to get the facts. I do not like to make a statement as to just what the situation is at Oak Ridge, until I have ascertained the facts and know that I am not misrepresenting anything to this body. I try to be very careful to make no misrepresentations. I am not sufficiently familiar with the facts this afternoon to pass upon them. I hope the report will go over, unless there is some imperative reason why it should not.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. When this matter was taken up before the Committee on Rules and Administration, I did not hear the question of Oak Ridge mentioned. I never had any idea at all that the bill could be construed at any time to cover the Oak Ridge situation. What we had in mind was the situation in Maryland, Virginia, and the District of Columbia. I am sure that those who introduced the bill in the House and those who handled it in the Senate contemplated nothing of the kind.

It might be possible to construe it as including Oak Ridge, but that would be a construction, it seems to me, which would be drawn merely from the general language of the bill. I would suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that it would be much better to allow the conference report to be adopted, and then let us meet the Oak Ridge situation squarely, as I believe more than merely permission from the Civil Service Commission will be required. I think the Senator will find, on investigation, that he will want more legislation than that. For that reason I think it would be better to adopt the conference report, and, so far as the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration is concerned, it will deal with it adequately and completely.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator means exactly what he says; but would it work out in that way? In the first place, the election will come on before Congress can deal with it at all, and at present the citizens who have made their homes in Oak Ridge will be deprived of the right to vote on local questions, and will be deprived of the right to vote on county matters, State matters, and Federal matters. They would be no longer, so far as voting is concerned, American citizens.

Mr. HAYDEN. So far as this particular piece of legislation is concerned, unless they have at the moment an independent party not affiliated with either the Democratic or Republican Party, they would be, under existing law, deprived of the right to vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I was in hopes that we might send the report back to conference, so that the law might be made perfectly intelligible to everyone.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, it is my understanding that what the Senator from Tennessee desires is that the workers at Oak Ridge, Tenn., have the same privileges as would be obtained for persons in Maryland and Virginia.

Mr. McKELLAR. Precisely. If it is good for Alexandria, Va., it should be good for Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the thing to do is to reject the conference report completely, send it back to conference and then see if the conferees can meet the situation in Oak Ridge, which I am quite sure, on investigation, is not comparable to the situation in other areas, because of the particular Government ownership of the town, whereas residents of Maryland and of Virginia live in their own homes and are in a situation which is similar to that of citizens almost anywhere else. I am sure the problem is complicated beyond the mere question of whether a person can vote in a city election.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, having known the Senator from Arizona for a third of a century, and knowing what a fine man he is, I know he would not argue anything but that which he thinks is right. But I invite the Senator's attention to this point. Does he believe there should be a municipal government in Tennessee or in Arizona, after the Federal Government has constructed a plant at such a place, or does he believe that we should deprive citizens there of the rights of citizenship and turn the matter over to a corporation to issue licenses for the privilege of doing business? I am sure the Senator would not stand for that for a moment.

Mr. HAYDEN. Not for a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is not a life-and-death matter. Why not take sufficient time fully to consider the bill? Why should it be made to apply to Alexandria, Va., for instance, and not to apply to exactly the same conditions in Tennessee?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is where I disagree with the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The same proposition is involved.

Mr. HAYDEN. No; the town of Oak Ridge belongs to the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. HAYDEN. The United States built the town.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a species of socialism to which, I am sure, the Senator, upon reflection, would not want to subscribe.

Mr. HAYDEN. It is my understanding that Oak Ridge, Tenn., is completely under the control of the Government of the United States, whereas Alexandria, Va., and Rockville, Md., are not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oak Ridge is completely under the control of the Andover Corp., which was organized in New York. Substantially the same persons have control of it as had control of the buildings at Oak Ridge.

Mr. HAYDEN. For that reason it is not a parallel case, and, therefore, I do not think it should be included in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a motion—I apologize to the Senator from Minnesota——

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should be more than happy, at the conclusion of my remarks, to yield to the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose of making a motion.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I understand the distinguished Senator from Tennessee has made a motion to send the conference report somewhere, but I did not hear where he proposed to send it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He proposed that the consideration of the report go over until tomorrow.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota said to the Senator from Tennessee that at the conclusion of his remarks he would be more than happy to yield to the Senator from Tennessee for the purpose of making any motion that he desired to make.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in order to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee, I am wondering if we might not agree to vote on the conference report at 1 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I intended to make a speech against the conference report on grounds somewhat different from those mentioned by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have always been an admirer of the Senator from Ohio, and I now admire him more than I ever did before.

Mr. TAFT. I should not want to agree to vote at 1 o'clock; I should not mind voting at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, insofar as the Senator from Minnesota is concerned, it is a matter of indifference as to the hour. I shall vote against the conference report. I do not wish to delay the business of the Senate. I think the report has received a great deal of consideration. I merely wanted to record my objection to the report, and I shall cast my vote against it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is the unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is none pending.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the senior Senator from Virginia is very much interested in this matter and wanted to be heard very briefly with reference to it, but he cannot be present tomorrow. We had hoped that we could dispose of the matter today. The bill has been pending before the Senate since April 1949. The conference report was brought back weeks ago, and first one Senator and then another had it delayed. Finally, notice was given that it would be taken up this afternoon. No Senator anticipated that there was going to be a great debate over something which had been pending so long in the House and Senate, and which, apparently, is not very complicated. Either we are going to relax the severe penalty of discharge for a minor violation or we are not. It is not very complicated.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I thought it would probably be satisfactory to vote on it tomorrow. If any Senator objects, of course, I shall withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. BYRD. I was going to suggest that we might vote on Monday.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would be satisfactory to me.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on the conference report on Monday next at 1 o'clock.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I shall not be here on Monday; I shall be present tomorrow.

Mr. LUCAS. I shall modify my request to make it read Monday.

Mr. TAFT. I have no objection, if the matter can be discussed tomorrow. I do not insist on being here for the vote. I think I can get a pair.

Mr. LUCAS. Some time would be available tomorrow. I shall be glad to stay with the Senator from Ohio as long as he wishes to remain to listen to the debate, both tomorrow and tonight.

Mr. TAFT. If we are to vote on Monday, we ought to have at least an hour tomorrow before the calendar is taken up to discuss the matter. The Senator announced his intention of taking up the calendar the first thing in the morning.

Mr. LUCAS. I would not object to taking an hour's time immediately following the call of the calendar. I should like to get on with the call of the calendar as quickly as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous consent agreement provides that at the conclusion of the calling of the calendar tomorrow the Senator from Washington shall have the floor. That would not preclude a unanimous consent agreement that an hour prior to the calling of the calendar may be devoted to a discussion of the conference report.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I make such a request in order to satisfy the Senator from Ohio and other Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request of the Senator from Illinois, that 1 hour tomorrow before the calling of the calendar be devoted to debate on the conference report, the time to be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the conference report?

Mr. TAFT. Also on Monday before 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Providing further that the conference report be voted on on Monday at 1 o'clock. Is there objection to the unanimous consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TAFT. Do I understand that discussion of the conference report will not be continued after the Senator from Minnesota concludes his speech?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Such a provision was not included in the unanimous consent request.

Mr. TAFT. I understand the Senator from Florida intends to return to a discussion of the social-security bill. The unanimous consent agreement, as I understand, is that we shall vote at 1 o'clock on Monday, and that 1 hour tomorrow and 1 hour on Monday shall be devoted to a discussion of the conference report, the time to be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the bill.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator accept that modification?

Mr. LUCAS. I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the Chair state his understanding of the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. LUCAS. The unanimous-consent request that I make again is that we vote on the conference report on Monday at 1 o'clock, and that the time from 12 to 1 o'clock on Monday be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents of the measure, and that on tomorrow, preceding the call of the calendar, 1 hour be set aside for the purpose of debating the conference report, the time to be divided equally between the opponents and proponents. In other words, 1 hour after we convene on tomorrow we shall proceed to a consideration of the conference report, the time to be divided equally between the proponents and the opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request does not refer to any time remaining this afternoon.

Mr. LUCAS. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, while the majority leader was off the floor I engaged in colloquy with some Senators who were here and who had been given notice that I wanted to ask certain questions of the committee. In conference with committee members they stated that they would prefer to answer the questions in the morning. I shall be called away tomorrow night, and I should very much like to get these questions answered tomorrow. I hope the vote on this conference report may also be had tomorrow, because I shall be absent on Monday. Is there any objection to our voting on the conference report tomorrow?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Virginia cannot be here tomorrow.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Nor can the junior Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. LUCAS. I would suggest that the Senators pair.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I should be delighted to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HOLLAND. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. LUCAS. I withdraw the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. HUMPHREY. It is not my desire to prolong the debate. I want to expedite the business of the Senate in order that we may work out some kind of agreement. I do wish to point out, however, that the point that was raised by the Senator from Tennessee is a very valid point. The Senator from Tennessee attacked the conference report on the basis that it was localized, and that it was specialized legislation on a national problem. The Senator from Tennessee has touched upon a very serious defect in the bill, namely, that Federal workers in the vicinity of Washington, D. C., should enjoy no more benefits than are enjoyed by Federal workers at Oak Ridge, Tenn., Minneapolis, Minn., or anywhere else, and that any legislation which is written for the protection of Federal workers, or to permit their participation in both nonpartisan and partisan political activities, should have a universal application and not be localized in its application.

Under section 16 of the Hatch Act at present, the Civil Service Commission is authorized, in its discretion, to allow Federal workers in certain specialized areas to run for local office or take part in political campaigns involving local offices. The areas involved are the immediate vicinity of the National Capital—in Maryland and Virginia—and "municipalities, the majority of whose voters are employed by the Government of the United States." The Civil Service Commission has thus far used this discretion by allowing Federal employees to take part in nonpartisan campaigns for local offices in the vicinity of Washington, D. C. It has not authorized them to take part in the local activities of the Democratic and Republican Parties.

Section 2 of the conference bill still leaves the Commission the discretion to allow or not to allow Federal employees to take part in local campaigns in these areas. Under section 2, however, if the Commission authorizes any campaign activities whatsoever by Federal employees, it must authorize participation in party campaigns as well as nonpartisan activities.

On the surface this seems to be a fair provision. But careful examination reveals many serious defects.

First of all, although it appears to enlarge the political rights of Federal workers, it allows the Civil Service Commission the authority to deny Federal workers the right to take part in any political activities whatsoever, whether on a nonpartisan or a party basis. In fact, there is an important probability that the Civil Service Commission, rather than reversing its historic position against allowing Federal employees to participate in party activities, would withdraw from Federal employees in the area of Washington the limited rights they now enjoy because under the conference report if Federal workers are permitted to participate in nonpartisan local affairs, it follows that they must be able to participate in party affairs. The historic position of the Civil Service Commission has been against Federal employees participating in party activities. I cannot see that the Civil Service Commission would reverse itself. If it does not reverse itself it will mean that Federal workers will have no political participation whatsoever.

Also, the section leaves to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission the problem of precisely what local positions a Federal worker may run for or campaign for. If the Commission decides to authorize local political activity in a given area, for example, the question of whether or not membership on the county or executive committee of the Democratic or Republican Party is a local office would be left to the shifting discretion of the Commission's administrative regulations.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, as a result of talking to Members in the cloakroom a few minutes ago, I have another proposal to make with respect to a unanimous-consent request. I take it that practically every Senator will be here on Tuesday when we vote on the social-security bill. I shall ask unanimous consent that following the vote on the social-security bill we immediately vote on the conference report without further debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does the Senator propose that we continue debate this evening until we finish with it?

Mr. LUCAS. Debate may be had at any time between now and the time we vote.

Mr. TAFT. Would the Senator still set aside an hour tomorrow? Perhaps by that time the Senator from Tennessee will have straightened out the matter in which he is interested and we can dispose of the conference report before the calendar is called.

Mr. LUCAS. I should think there would be plenty of time between now and Tuesday to debate the conference report.

Mr. TAFT. But the Senator is proposing to shut off debate, because if the vote immediately follows the vote on the social-security bill, we will be considering the social-security bill all that day until 4 o'clock. It seems to me it should be definitely understood that we will have an hour to debate the conference report tomorrow, after the Senator from Tennessee has cleared up the matter in which he is interested and then other business can follow.

Mr. LUCAS. I modify my request to comply with the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, that tomorrow, before we proceed to the call of the calendar, we take 1 hour, if necessary, to debate the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the time to be divided equally?

Mr. LUCAS. The time to be divided equally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no objection at all to that part of the request which has to do with the hour for the vote tomorrow. I am very hopeful that the vote can be taken either today or tomorrow, but if not, I hope it can be taken some time after Tuesday next week.

Mr. LUCAS. Is the Senator going to be here to vote on the social-security bill?

Mr. HOLLAND. I will not be here. When the time was fixed for the vote I was not advised as to the purpose to do that. I have a long-standing engagement which I wish to keep.

Mr. LUCAS. I recall the Senator speaking of it. I had nothing to do with the unanimous-consent agreement, so far as fixing Tuesday was concerned. The agreement was made, when the Senator from Florida was not present, between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN]. I was not here at the time, although I agreed to it with the Senator from Colorado in advance.

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall not be here Tuesday, and would very much like to have the vote on the other matter put over to Wednesday afternoon or Thursday morning, because I do not wish to miss the vote.

Mr. LUCAS. I withdraw my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Much as I would like to yield to my colleagues, the Senator from Minnesota desires to conclude his remarks at this time.

To summarize what I have said, the provisions of section 1 (d) to which I have taken exception were added in conference committee. The provisions did not appear in either the original House bill or in the Senate substitute.

Furthermore, the provisions of section 2, with which I have taken issue, were in my opinion inadequately considered. Opponents of this section were not given an opportunity to testify in public hearing in either the Senate or the House.

I urge that H. R. 1243 be disapproved by the Senate. Certainly if we do not defeat this bill, the President will be well advised to veto it. It would then be possible for the Congress of the United States to deal with the problems of the Hatch Act following open public hearings.

I should like to suggest that an adequate basis for those hearings is provided in S. 3014, a bill "to extend and protect the rights of Federal employees," which I introduced on February 8, 1950. This bill deals with the political rights of Federal employees as a matter of national policy rather than in specialized local terms. It also provides additional protection for Federal employees against intimidation, coercion, and discrimination.

It should be clearly understood that the original intent of the bill as introduced by the Representative from Washington, Mr. MITCHELL, in the House of Representatives, and the bill as it came to the Senate and to the committee, was for but one purpose, namely, to be able to relax some of the penalties inflicted under the original Hatch Act against a person who had been found guilty of violation of the Hatch Act. The original purpose was to give to the Civil Service Commission a certain amount of discretionary authority as to the nature of the penalty, rather than demand the removal of a particular Government worker for a minor violation in a minor incident.

What has happened? Following the introduction of the bill, its original passage by the House and its coming to the Senate, it was amended, first in the Senate committee, then on the Senate floor, and it has been rewritten and revised in the conference committee, to such a point that the original purpose has been lost and two other purposes have been added. One of the other purposes was to give the opportunity to the committees of the Congress to obtain what I consider to be confidential records and information. However, that has been referred to by the Senator from Kansas, and I accept his clarification.

The next point was that the provision covering political participation by Government workers has been completely rewritten. When a national problem has been localized in a particular area the Civil Service Commission can either deny or reject or permit or withhold political participation on the part of Government workers. I say that is too much discretionary authority, and I say it can be abused.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I must yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. May I ask the Senator if it is not the present law that the Civil Service Commission has authority to grant or to withhold this permission, and that they are now exercising that very authority by granting the permission to participate, but do not permit employees to participate in parties? Is not that correct?

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Mississippi is right, insofar as nonpartisan local elections are concerned, but the conference report says they cannot grant the authority just in a nonpartisan local election, but if they grant it in a nonpartisan local election they also grant it in party elections.

The Senator from Minnesota says that the historic position of the Civil Service Commission, working under the Hatch Act, is to deny a Federal worker the opportunity to be a political party participant. I see no reason to believe that if the Hatch Act is to do what it is supposed to do, that is, to remove Federal employees from political coercion, from any kind of political management by political officeholders, the Civil Service Commission is going to permit workers to participate in political activities, that is, to hold political party positions. I do not think it will. So this resolves itself down to the fact that the Federal worker will have neither party participation nor nonparty participation.

I submit that the conference report has not within it the language properly to clarify what the Civil Service Commission is supposed to do. It has all this discretionary authority without any yardstick or measurement of political activity or political participation for Federal workers.

Therefore, I believe, Mr. President, with the Senator from Tennessee, that the report ought to be restudied. I believe there is a real need for clarification of the Hatch Act, as provided in section 1. I am not adverse to proper clarification of the Hatch Act, insofar as participation in party and nonpartisan elections is concerned, but I am opposed to the discretionary authority of the Civil Service Commission to deny to a Federal worker any political participation, either nonpartisan or party.

This is just confusion confounded and compounded. I cannot believe that this is a bill which should be accepted, because the Hatch Act had a particular purpose. The Hatch Act had the purpose of seeing to it that no elected political official, or any appointed official, could in any way project the activities of Federal officeholders or workers toward a particular political objective. There are many people who do not like the Hatch Act, but, be that as it may, it came into effect because of a need, the need being to keep the civil servant away from being made into a party worker. In other words, it is very easy to have a kind of spoils system, in which a Federal worker can be used as a party precinct worker, even against his will. I do not want that to happen, but I do want the employee to have the privilege of citizenship rights, the right to speak out, the right, if he desires, to run for public office, or the right to be a participant in local, county, or State politics, or in national politics.

The law of the land can be so modified that these rights can be protected, but, as the Senator from Tennessee said very well as to Oak Ridge, there is a community of 25,000 people who have no rights, who have been disfranchised. There is no participation for them. The bill does not apply to them, and I submit that if the problem is difficult in Virginia because of the number of Federal workers, and if it is difficult in Maryland, then what is wrong with having the problem taken care of not only there—and I want the condition there corrected—but how about correcting it in Tennessee, or in Minnesota? There are some Federal workers in Minnesota, and for all practical purposes they have been put in a political deep freeze. They are not permitted even to open their mouths about politics, under the present Hatch Act. There is a modicum of reasonableness we can approach, but surely this bill as it was written in conference does not meet this reasonable standard.

Mr. President, this concludes my remarks in reference to the conference report.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a memorandum printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON H. R. 1243, A BILL TO AMEND THE HATCH ACT

I. SUMMARY

The pending measure to amend the Hatch Act (H. R. 1243) has been handled in a manner that violates sound legislative procedure. It has many grave defects and serious ambiguities. At least one of its provisions is unnecessary.

The measure therefore should not be enacted into law. If it is approved by both Houses of the Congress, it should be vetoed by the President.

If it is vetoed by the President, open public hearings can then be held on the many provisions of the measure that have thus far been considered behind closed doors and a sound national policy on the important matters involved can be developed in a democratic fashion.

II. BACKGROUND OF THE HATCH ACT AMENDMENT

The original bill, consisting of section 1 only, was introduced in January 1949, by Representative HUGH MITCHELL, of Washington, with the strong support of the Civil Service Commission. It was passed by voice vote without objection on February 9, 1949.

Section 2 was added in the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration. A brief hearing was held at which proponents of the section were allowed to testify. However, opponents of the section were denied an opportunity to present their views to the committee. Moreover, the committee has refused to make available to the public the testimony of the proponents.

The first version of section 3 was added on the floor of the Senate. The amended bill was passed in the Senate by a voice vote on January 19, 1950.

The measure then went to conference. Here opponents of section 2 were again denied the right to testify at a public session.

The conferees then amended each section of the Senate bill. The amended bill was then reported to Congress by the conference committee on May 3, 1950.

The conference report was approved in the House by a vote of 203 to 140.

III. SECTION 1—PENALTIES FOR VIOLATIONS OF THE HATCH ACT

At present the Civil Service Commission is required to punish violators of the Hatch Act by permanent exclusion from employment with the Federal Government.

Section 1 authorizes lesser penalties. By unanimous vote the Commission may impose a penalty of no less than 30 days' suspension without pay.

This is a desirable improvement in the Hatch Act, since the extreme penalties presently provided for make enforcement difficult.

However, section 1 (d) of the conference report contains a grave defect, one that would undermine the constitutional prerogatives of the President.

Section 1 (d) reads as follows:

"(d) Records containing testimony or other evidence relevant to charges and allegations of a violation or violations of this act in proceedings had pursuant to this section shall be made available to either the Senate or the House of Representatives upon the request of any committee thereof."

When the measure passed the Senate on January 19 it provided merely that testimony in any hearings on violations should be available to congressional committees. The conference bill, however, broadens this provision to cover records containing testimony or other evidence.

This means that if the measure became law any congressional committee would, as a matter of statutory right, have access to all Civil Service Commission files relating to people who have been accused of having violated the Hatch Act.

This means that whenever any committee of Congress wanted access to confidential civil-service files, all that would be necessary to obtain those files would be to have someone make an accusation that a person had violated the Hatch Act.

All Presidents of the United States from George Washington on have maintained the position that it is a matter of Presidential discretion whether or not to make confidential materials available to congressional committees and to determine the conditions under which such material might be made available, if at all.

If the pending measure were signed by the President, the President would thereby sign away this historic prerogative. Signature of this measure by the President would mean a blanket commitment in advance to make all civil-service records available to any congressional committee in all cases where Federal employees have been accused of violating the Hatch Act.

Moreover, it would also provide an important precedent for similar legislation giving congressional committees a statutory right to obtain records relating to loyalty cases.

Section 1 (d) is so dangerous that if it were the only defect in the measure, it alone would provide ample justification for a veto.

IV. SECTION 2—ALLOWING FEDERAL EMPLOYEES TO TAKE PART IN LOCAL POLITICAL ACTIVITIES

Under section 16 of the Hatch Act at present, the Civil Service Commission is authorized, in its discretion, to allow Federal workers in certain specialized areas to run for local office or take part in political campaigns involving local offices. The areas involved are the immediate vicinity of the National Capital in Maryland and Virginia and municipalities, the majority of whose voters are employed by the Government of the United States. The Civil Service Commission has thus far used this discretion by allowing Federal employees to take part in nonpartisan campaigns for local offices in the vicinity of Washington, D. C. It has not authorized them to take part in the local activities of the Democratic and Republican Parties.

Section 2 of the conference bill still leaves the Commission the discretion to allow or not to allow Federal employees to take part in local campaigns in these areas. Under section 2, however, if the Commission authorizes any campaign activities whatsoever by Federal employees, it must authorize participation in party campaigns as well as nonpartisan activities.

On the surface this seems to be a fair provision. But careful examination reveals many serious defects.

First of all, although it appears to enlarge the political rights of Federal workers, it allows the Civil Service Commission the authority to deny Federal workers the right to take part in any political activities whatsoever, whether on a nonpartisan or a party basis. In fact, there is an important probability that the Civil Service Commission—rather than reverse its historic position against allowing Federal employees to participate in party activities—would withdraw from Federal employees in the area of Washington the limited rights they now enjoy.

Second, it is specialized legislation dealing with a problem of high national policy on a purely localized basis. This was conceded on the floor of the House by Representative LECOMPTE, who nevertheless supported the measure. Mr. LECOMPTE stated, "I think I might say to the minority leader, this is specialized legislation for a peculiar situation in the adjacent districts. I do not like specialized legislation for the benefit of a special area or a special group. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 4, 1950, p. 6389.)

The question was then raised on the floor of the House as to why Federal workers in other areas of the country might not be allowed similar privileges. The only answer given was that the amendment of the Hatch Act many years ago which inserted section 16 in the Hatch Act was special legislation and that section 16 set a precedent.

This precedent of dealing with an important national policy through specialized legislation should be broken. The problem of enlarging and protecting the rights of Federal employees should be handled in a fashion that considers the problems of all Federal employees no matter where they may happen to reside or vote.

Third, the section leaves to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission the problem of precisely what local positions a Federal worker may run for or campaign for. If the Commission decides to authorize local political activity in a given area, for example, the question of whether or not membership on the county or executive committee of the Democratic or Republican Party is a local office would be left to the shifting discretion of the Commission's administrative regulations.

Fourth, the section opens the lid of a Pandora's box of abuses by completely failing to provide Federal employees with needed additional protection against political coercion and discrimination. It fails to recognize that should the Commission allow party activities by Federal employees in a given area, various politicians might attempt to dragoon Federal employees into party activities against their will.

V. SECTION 3—ON POLITICAL CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS

Section 612 of the Criminal Code provides for fines up to $1,000 or imprisonment of up to one year, or both, for anyone who publishes or distributes political campaign material without adequate indication of the source.

When section 3 was added to the bill on the floor of the Senate, it increased these penalties to $5,000 and 2 years imprisonment.

The conference version of section 3 restores the penalties contained in the criminal code at present.

The only change it makes in the present law is that it makes it a crime to "knowingly transport such political statements in interstate commerce" as well as to distribute them. This is a difference without much of a distinction. It is doubtful whether section 3 adds anything at all, or anything of any consequence, to the present provisions of the criminal code.

VI. NEED FOR OPEN PUBLIC HEARINGS

The entire measure should be considered in an open and democratic fashion at public hearings in both Houses of Congress.

So far as section 2 is concerned a sound basis for such hearings is provided in S. 3014, "To extend and protect the rights of Federal employees" which has been pending before the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration since February 8, 1950. This measure would enlarge the political rights of all Federal employees no matter where they reside. It would also supplement existing legal protections for Federal employees by making it unlawful for any executive official to discriminate against Federal employees because of political affiliations or political activities, by requiring the Civil Service Commission to acquaint Federal employees with their rights under the various provisions of law that protect them against intimidation and coercion and by directing the Civil Service Commission to establish a special appeals and complaints procedure to make statutory protections for Federal employees more meaningful.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000), to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk amendments to H. R. 6000. The amendments are submitted in behalf of myself and the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN].

I have a statement pertaining to the amendments, which describes the purposes of the amendments in general terms. The purpose of the amendments, broadly speaking, is to raise the maximum individual old-age-assistance grant from $50 to $65 per month. They do so by providing that the Federal Government shall match any additional individual grants above $50 by providing one-third of that amount.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments offered by the junior Senator from New York and myself may be printed in the RECORD at this point, together with the statement of explanation of the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received and will lie on the table and be printed.

The amendments will also be printed in the RECORD, together with the statement submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendments and the statement of explanation are as follows:

On page 375, line 19, strike out the words "$50" and insert in lieu thereof "$65."

On page 376, beginning with line 1, strike out all down to and including line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(B) one-half of the amount by which such expenditures exceed the product obtained under clause (A), not counting so much of the expenditures with respect to any month as exceeds the product of $50 multiplied by the total number of such individuals (other than those included in clause (D)) who received old-age assistance for such month, plus

"(C) one-third of the amount by which such expenditures (other than expenditures with respect to individuals included in clause (D)) exceed the sum of the products obtained under clauses (A) and (B), plus."

On page 376, line 5, strike out "(C)" and insert in lieu thereof "(D)".

On page 383, beginning with line 4, strike out all down to and including line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 342. (a) Section 1003 (a) of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 1003. (a) From the sums appropriated therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to each State which has an approved plan for aid to the blind for each quarter, beginning with the quarter beginning October 1, 1950, (1) an amount, which shall be used exclusively as aid to the blind, equal to the sum of the following proportions of the total amounts expended during such quarter as aid to the blind under the State plan, not counting so much of such expenditures with respect to any individual for any month as exceeds $65—

"'(A) three-fourths of such expenditures, not counting so much of the expenditures with respect to any month as exceeds the product of $20 multiplied by the total number of such individuals who received aid to the blind for such month, plus

"'(B) one-half of the amount by which such expenditures exceed the product obtained under clause (A), not counting so much of the expenditures with respect to any month as exceeds the product of $50 multiplied by the total number of such individuals who received aid to the blind for such month, plus.

"'(C) one-third of the amount by which such expenditures exceed the sum of the products obtained under clauses (A) and (B); and (2) an amount equal to one-half of the total of the sums expended during such quarter as found necessary by the Administrator for the proper and efficient administration of the plan, which amount shall be used for paying the costs of administering the State plan or for aid to the blind, or both, and for no other purpose.'

"(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect October 1, 1950."

The amendment is designed to raise the maximum individual old-age-assistance grant from $50 to $65 per month. It does so by providing that the Federal Government shall match any additional individual grants above $50 by providing one-third of that amount.

I also send to the desk, Mr. President, a second amendment designed to accomplish the same purpose in the assistance-to-the-blind program of the Social Security Act.

These amendments, Mr. President, are vital if America is to live up to its obligations to those of its citizens who have contributed their years and their efforts to this Nation's welfare, and now find themselves—frequently with their energies spent—too old to work. A maximum of $65 per month for the aged should be a minimum. The success of the medical profession in prolonging life when considered together with the falling birth rate, has had the effect of emphasizing the importance of providing for the aged in America. An ever-growing proportion of the population is in the older age group. Whereas fewer than 3 percent of the population in 1850 was 65 years of age, that proportion in 1940 was 7 percent, and it is expected to grow to 10 percent in 1970.

It is recognized by all that in spite of the old-age-insurance provisions of the Social Security Act, there is a need for a supplementary program to fill in the gaps and provide for the existing aged who can never qualify for social security. In addition, I think it is clear that there probably always will be a small but significant part of the population which cannot qualify under the insurance program.

Under H. R. 6000 as it passed the House, a provision is made that the Federal Government shall pay a share of four-fifths of the first $25 of a State's average monthly payment per recipient. For the next $10 the Federal Government's share is to be one-half. In view of the fact that the maximum of $50 is maintained, the Federal Government's share for the last $15 is to be one-third.

The bill as it is now on the floor of the Senate from the Senate Finance Committee, changes that formula established by the House and maintains the formula of the present act as amended in 1948, under which the Federal Government is to provide three-fourths of the first $20 and is then to provide one-half of the remainder up to a $50 maximum.

The same formula applies for the blind.

I trust that the Senate will as a minimum at least restore the House formula for the first $50. My own amendment, which I plan to bring up whether or not the formula is restored, would raise the maximum to $65 and provide that the Federal Government's share of the amount from $50 to $65 shall be one-third.

I trust that this amendment will receive the support of the Senate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to say that when we vote on House bill 6000 and the amendments thereto I hope every United States Senator will search deeply into his conscience to determine whether he believes the recipients of old-age assistance can live upon the puny, paltry pensions they are receiving throughout the United States. I want Senators to ask themselves honestly how the recipient of an old-age pension can live on $40 a month.

After looking over the national record of the pension system of the country and seeing the intolerably low pensions which our old people are receiving, I think it is about time that we face up to the fact that no matter whether a person may live in the South or the North, in the East or the West, in the center of the country or at any of its four corners, it is utterly impossible for a human being to be able to subsist on a maximum pension of $50 a month. Several States have, by their own State enactments, provided a pension higher than that. But it is impossible for a decent standard of living to be maintained for an individual citizen at $70 a month. Therefore the proposal by the junior Senator from New York and the junior Senator from Minnesota is to my mind a very moderate, conservative, and reasonable proposal which will call upon the States to share in the benefits paid to the old people. I hope that when that proposal, or others like it, come to the floor, they will be given support, because I cannot imagine a Congress which has provided liberal pensions for its own membership—and that we have done—that would in any way deny this modicum of a pension for the average American citizen that is in need of a decent pension.

THE FARM PROGRAM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement prepared by me relating to the farm program. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a statement entitled "The Farm Program—Facts and Fiction," prepared by me to send out to some of my constituents in the State of Minnesota.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a letter from Secretary of Agriculture Charles F. Brannan to the Comptroller General, Lindsay C. Warren, dated June 1, 1950, together with certain correspondence.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARM PROBLEM

(By HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

Secretary Brannan and the President have made it clear they believe this Congress should revise its present piecemeal farm legislation policy and adopt a program along the lines of the Brannan plan to prevent continued piling up of perishable farm commodity surpluses and bring order to the national agricultural situation.

In a Presidential message received just before the House recessed, President Truman asked for a five-point program:

1. Provide a definite "farm income" goal on which to base whatever form of price support is used.
2. Extend the list of products to be supported.
3. Set up production payments.
4. Require soil conservation and production adjustments as a condition of production payments.
5. Confine supports to the 98 percent of American farms that are family-sized, leaving out the 2 percent that are huge corporations.

PMA MEETING

I am sure you have all heard and read a great deal about the recent farm meeting in St. Paul sponsored by the Production Marketing Administration. Despite all the comments to the contrary, the meeting was of vital importance to Midwest agriculture. Secretary Brannan presented a serious and well thought out address outlining, first, the provisions of the present agricultural legislation as well as its shortcomings, and, second, his proposal which has commonly been called the Brannan plan. The Secretary's message was enthusiastically received and does provide a statement of policy which is deserving of the fullest consideration by every farmer and farm leader in the country.

My participation in the meeting has come in for some criticism by the metropolitan press. This was to be expected, since I have not agreed with much of the metropolitan press on agricultural legislation. I may add that neither have the farmers agreed with it, as was indicated by the election in 1948. The substance of my address centered around the following items:

1. The lack of unity as to agricultural policy among the agricultural organizations is a very disconcerting and disturbing element in the preparation of legislation.
2. The wartime agricultural price-support program does not meet the requirements of the postwar period when production is high and consumption is at lower level.
3. The time has arrived when we must not only take into consideration producers' interests but also the interests of the consumer and the market.
4. While agricultural income has dropped 17 percent in 1949 and another projected estimated 6 percent in 1950, corporation income is going up and profits are at unprecedented levels.
5. Farm prices have been breaking while the items the farmer buys have continued to rise in price. This within itself is an unhealthy sign and is one that should be given immediate attention.
6. The proposals as outlined by Secretary Brannan should have an experimental run or test or two items, such as potatoes and eggs. It is only in this matter than the country can see how a production-payment system would work.
7. Production payments are not new. They were proposed and enacted into law by the Eightieth Congress in the Hope-Aiken Act. One of the provisions of the present legislation of the Eighty-first Congress is the elimination of compensatory or production payments. During the debate on the present legislation I pointed out this weakness and urged that production payments be continued.

8. I concluded my address by urging farmers to hold group meetings at a local level to discuss all proposed agricultural programs. Farm legislation must not be handed down from on top. It must grow out of the needs and understanding of the farmers who do the producing.

The Brannan plan offers a principle. How far that principle should be applied can best be measured by the practical on-the-spot knowledge and observations of the farmers who do the producing and the selling. I urged our Minnesota farmers not to accept any plan merely because of its sponsorship or authorship, but rather to carefully analyze the proposals and to offer constructive criticism and analyses to their Congressmen, Senators and the Department of Agriculture.

We need guidance on farm legislation and we cannot wait too long. Minnesota farmers realize a great deal of their income from what are called perishable commodities. Unfortunately, most of these perishable commodities, such as eggs, turkeys, ducks, chickens, hogs, and so forth, are not included in the mandatory price support list of the Agriculture Act of 1949. This means that our farmers frequently find themselves without effective price supports. The Brannan plan does offer a program to meet this weakness in existing legislation. It is difficult to store perishable products. They must be moved into the market if they are not to spoil or deteriorate. Storage of eggs, pork, butter and other perishable commodities is already producing a very serious economic and moral problem. In a nation where food is still needed by thousands of families and in a world where millions of people are living on the very edge of life because of food shortage, it is downright immoral to have food spoil.

At a later date I shall send you a complete statement of my own observations on agricultural policy. We have made great strides with our REA program, farm cooperatives, farm credit, and farm home administration. These programs will all be jeopardized unless there is a unity of support by farm organizations and an acceptance by the public.

THE FARM PROGRAM—FACTS AND FICTION

(By HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

Newspaper headlines about potato price supports, eggs in a Kansas cave, Government purchases of butter, and other equally dramatic and disturbing news reports have raised many doubts in our minds concerning the value and purpose of a price support program.

Minnesota's Sixth District Congressman, FRED MARSHALL, is considered by the Congress to be one of the outstanding authorities on agricultural matters. I have discussed many agricultural problems with FRED MARSHALL and certainly will to a substantial degree be guided by his counsel.

One thing is clear, the present farm program has weaknesses and must be reviewed with the following things in mind:

1. The importance of a sound agricultural economy which means good prices for farm products.

2. The effect of high agricultural prices upon the consumer and his purchasing power.

3. Whether or not the Government has the ability to finance extensive price-support programs.

Certainly the major problem in farm legislation concerns itself with perishable commodities. Present legislation has glaring inadequacies in this field.

Many farmers and farm economists feel that a farm plan that includes the production-payment method could be substituted for the present method which is based upon Government purchases of perishable farm products. Under a production-payment program, nonstorable farm produce would find its normal price level in the free market. The difference between the market price and a Government support price would be made up by a direct payment to the farmer. This, of course, would necessitate some production controls, marketing agreements, and quotas. Under this proposal the farmer would regulate his own program through cooperating with existing PMA county and community committeemen. The record of such a program on a limited basis since its start in the days of the old AAA has been good.

There is no question but that production payments would save substantial amounts for the buying public. Our present price-support program does not permit the normal flow of farm products into the market. It is based on the old theory of scarcity which causes prices to go up. Obviously the consumer pays higher prices and the taxpayer still pays the bill.

Many charges concerning the Commodity Credit Corporation have been made without fact. Over the past 17 years the records of the CCC show that the loss to the Government on price supports represents less than 5 percent of the funds used during the entire period. We must remember that during this period American agriculture lifted itself from the depths of depression that almost destroyed the agricultural economy. During this 17 years CCC's operation in commodities stored, such as corn, cotton, and wheat, etc., yielded a profit of over $90,000,000. This clearly indicates that the real problem in price supports is in perishable commodities. Of the total loss to the CCC almost two-thirds of the amount was attributable to the potato price-support program. This trouble was due to the fact that the potato program had no marketing or production quotas and rested its entire control system on acreage allotments. The producers who did not cooperate with the Government by not complying with acreage allotments actually created the bulk of the loss.

We hear many attacks on the Government's storage of large quantities of wheat and corn. Actually when you consider our total production the storage program is but a small portion. Our reserves of corn and wheat are not large when you consider the possibility of a serious crop failure or a national military emergency. Government loans on stored crops cannot be classed as loss. Stored crops are inventory assets.

FARM PURCHASING POWER

Since 1948 the price of the tractor has more than doubled in relation to the price of hogs. In 1948 a farmer could buy a tractor with his receipts from twenty-five 225-pound hogs. Today he must sell 54.

In 1948 the farmer could buy a tractor from the sale of 536 bushels of wheat. Today he must sell 950 bushels of wheat.

Farm prices have been declining much more rapidly than the prices of the commodities the farmer must buy to operate his farm. The farmer's net income since 1948 has gone down 17 percent. It is estimated that he will lose another 6 percent in 1950.

Our agricultural program must include:

1. A workable method of price supports for perishable commodities.

2. Consideration of consumer needs and ability and willingness of the American taxpayer to support the program.

3. Mechanism to eliminate the waste of food.

4. Provisions to keep the price within the market.

5. Wider distribution and consumption of food products for both America and the unfortunate people in other parts of the world.

A sound agricultural economy is vital to the Nation. It is imperative that individual farmers and farm organizations carefully examine all proposals being made to strengthen and alter the farm program. We cannot afford to permit the farm program to become a political football.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, June 12, 1950.

Hon. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR HUMPHREY: Senator AIKEN and others recently spoke about a meeting of the Production and Marketing Administration personnel at St. Paul, Minn., on April 3 and 4, 1950 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 11, 1950, p. 5050). As a result, the Honorable Lindsay C. Warren, Comptroller General, was requested to investigate the occurrence. The attached letter was prepared and submitted for his use.

As a friend of the farmer-elected farmer committee system of administering farm programs, I am sure you will be interested in it.

Best regards,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
June 1, 1950.

Hon. LINDSAY C. WARREN,
Comptroller General.

DEAR MR. WARREN: I appreciate the opportunity you have given me to outline the nature and circumstances of the meeting of Production and Marketing personnel held at St. Paul, Minn., on April 3 and 4, 1950, which I addressed and about which there has been some criticism on the floor of the Senate.

First, something about the character of the meeting. This was an ordinary staff meeting of the same type and purpose as many others held by this agency and other agencies and bureaus of the Department of Agriculture for many years, and, I am confident, held by many other agencies of Government from time to time. There were about 2,322 Production and Marketing Administration committeemen at the meeting. Of this number, about 245 were county committeemen, and about 2,077 were community committeemen. The per diem and travel expenses of the county committeemen amounts to approximately $8,100. The per diem and travel costs of the attending community committeemen amounts to approximately $34,000. If I understand Senator AIKEN's statements correctly, he objects only to the presence at the meeting of the community committeemen. It is clear from the following excerpt from the record that Senator AIKEN does not object to the presence of the county committeemen at this meeting:

"On April 3 and 4 the county committee men of the Production and Marketing Administration for the State of Minnesota met in St. Paul. This was an annual meeting, a perfectly proper meeting called for the purpose of developing an agricultural conservation program for 1951.

"These programs have generally been beneficial to each of the 48 States and to the national agricultural economy.

"The 2-day meeting of the county committeemen at St. Paul was for a perfectly logical and legitimate purpose.

"However, Mr. President, an incident connected with this meeting was, in my opinion, neither logical nor legitimate" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 11, p. 5050).

The farmer committeemen carry out the programs authorized by the Congress and which are assigned to the Production and Marketing Administration of the Department of Agriculture. It is undoubtedly the most efficient and least costly means of accomplishing the task. Please note that the county committeemen and the community committeemen do identical types of work. Only the geographic area of responsibility is different, although the county committeemen act in a somewhat supervisory capacity over the community committeemen. Both county and community committeemen receive the same scale of remuneration, paid from the same sources and for the same types of service.

Section 7 (b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act of 1938, as amended, provides as follows:

"The Secretary (of Agriculture) shall designate local administrative areas (communities or townships) as units of administration of programs under this section. No such local area shall include more than one county or parts of different counties. Farmers within any such local administrative area, and participating or cooperating in programs administered within such area, shall elect annually from among their number a local committee of not more than three members for such area and shall also elect annually from among their number a delegate to a county convention for the election of a county committee. The delegates from the various local areas in the county shall, in a county convention, elect annually the county committee for the county which shall consist of three members who are farmers in the county. The local committee shall select a secretary and may utilize the county agricultural extension agent."

In accordance with this provision of the law, annual and nonpartisan elections are held in each agricultural community in the United States. In 1949 elections were held in 29,106 communities and that many community committees were elected with about 87,000 committee members. These committeemen are charged with the responsibility of administering the PMA programs in their communities for 1950. They do not receive a fixed salary for their services but do receive a daily wage and travel expenses. This is an important variance from the status of the usual Federal employee, who when in travel status receives his salary plus a travel per diem, plus railroad fare or car mileage.

In administering the PMA programs for the fiscal year 1948–49, community committeemen were paid an average of $6.30 per day for an average of 6.5 days spent in carrying on PMA program work. The balance of the time which they devoted to program work was performed without remuneration from any Government sources whatsoever. Nearly all committeemen spend considerably more of their time in program work for which they receive no compensation. They are working for improved conditions for agriculture and for the Nation and their remuneration comes from the satisfaction in this service.

County committeemen received an average of $6.90 per day for an average of 44.1 days work on the programs during the same fiscal year 1948–49. They, too, work many more days than they are compensated for.

It is noteworthy that the committeemen would receive approximately the same amount of money throughout the year for work done whether or not they made this trip to St. Paul. There is just so much money available for the reimbursement of community committeemen and when that sum is used up they continue to work thereafter without remuneration. The implication that representative American farmers could be bribed or induced to attend a meeting by the offer of $8 per day plus 5 cents a mile for travel is unthinkable, unwarranted, and unjust to American farmers.

All of these committeemen are elected to their positions annually and although many are reelected year after year, it is necessary to carry on a program of training in order that the new members may be acquainted with their duties and both the new members and the old members acquainted with the changes in the programs as those changes are authorized from time to time by the Congress and established by the Secretary.

Conferences for the purpose of training and instructing new committeemen occur annually throughout the entire United States. Some of these conferences are held in smaller groups at various places throughout the State with the State committee people traveling to these various meetings. The method of instruction is left to the discretion of the State committee people, many of whom find it desirable to bring the committeemen together once a year for a general discussion of programs.

The conferences are carefully planned and are hard-working affairs. The farmer committeemen who attend receive appreciable benefit from the straight program training and instruction which is made available to them. It has also been found that in the conduct of these conferences a very useful purpose can be served by providing committeemen with the opportunity to hear first hand the views of some of the leading agriculturalists in the country. This has led to the general practice of inviting well-known and accepted agricultural leaders to participate on conference programs. For example, the principal speaker at the Vermont State PMA conference this year was Senator GEORGE D. AIKEN. The North Carolina State PMA conference this year invited Senator CLYDE R. HOEY as its main speaker. Senator SPESSARD L. HOLLAND spoke at the Florida State PMA conference. It has been a generally accepted practice when time would permit for the Secretary of Agriculture to attend one or more of these State conferences throughout the year. Each of the two preceding Secretaries of Agriculture had spoken at an identical type of meeting in Minnesota and at many other such meetings in other States.

The two Senators from Minnesota were invited to attend this meeting. Senator EDWARD J. THYE did not attend. The invitation to him and his reply are attached. Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY did appear on the program.

In 1948, the then Secretary of Agriculture, CLINTON P. ANDERSON, was the principal speaker and discussed existing and proposed farm legislation.

The same kind of an invitation or notice of Mr. ANDERSON's expected attendance at the meeting was issued in which attention of the committeemen was called to the fact that per diem and travel would be allowed.

So that you may judge the character of the remarks made by me during the session, I have supplied you with a transcript of a recording taken at the meeting. I also have a recording for your use if you care to check against the written transcript. I especially invite your attention to the fact that this was a discussion of the farm problem. No reference was made to a political party or to a political candidate (unless Allan Kline is now a political candidate). The listeners were not exhorted to vote in one fashion or another on any issue whatsoever; in fact, the question of voting is not mentioned specifically or by innuendo.

Without respect to the question as to whether or not such meetings are sound administration or are authorized by law—my views on these two points being very clear that they are both wise and lawful—I believe these conclusions are inescapable:

First, the community committeemen who attended this meeting will have received at the end of the year no more money than if they had not attended this meeting. Approximately so much money is available each year for administrative costs and when these funds are exhausted, the farmers continue their work without remuneration. They would have earned this money before the year was out in some other fashion.

Second, there is nothing about the convening or conduct of this meeting which is in any wise different from many other meetings which have been held this year and in previous years throughout the country by this and many other agencies of Government.

Third, there is nothing different about this meeting than previous meetings held in this State, even including the nature, phraseology, and character of the notice or invitation sent to the community committeemen.

Fourth, community committeemen and county committeemen are engaged in the very same type of program and, therefore, if, as it is already acknowledged, this meeting was perfectly proper as far as county committeemen are concerned, it very logically follows that it was equally proper as far as community committeemen are concerned.

Fifth, the fact that Senator HUMPHREY addressed this meeting in political terms cannot be charged to those who organized the meeting or to the Secretary of Agriculture. Senator THYE, a member of the opposite party, was invited and could have spoken as vehemently on the other side of the same issues if he had chosen to do so. I do not believe it wise to exclude Members of Congress from these meetings, and I assume that Senator AIKEN agrees for he has availed himself of such opportunity subsequent to the date he took exception to the St. Paul meeting.

Obviously, if there is any additional information which we can supply to you with regard to this matter, we shall be pleased to do so.

Yours truly,

CHARLES F. BRANNAN,
Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
St. Paul, Minn., March 16, 1950.

DEAR COMMUNITY COMMITTEEMAN: In order to give you an opportunity to meet and hear our Secretary of Agriculture, Charles F. Brannan, and the Administrator of our Production and Marketing Administration, Ralph Trigg, the State committee has arranged for you to attend the second day of the annual Minnesota County PMA Committee meeting in the arena of the St. Paul Auditorium, on Tuesday, April 4.

The meeting will open at 10 o'clock, and Administrator Trigg's speech is scheduled at 11 on Tuesday morning, April 4. Secretary Brannan will speak at 2:30 in the afternoon.

The decline in farm prices has placed even greater emphasis on the price-support program which we in PMA are administering. We know you realize how controversial this subject has become. We feel it is extremely important for you community committeemen who represent agriculture at the grass roots, to have this chance to hear your Secretary who is making a terrific fight to maintain some measure of economic stability for farmers.

Our production picture has changed since the war as it pertains to basic crops such as wheat and corn. With acreage allotments come diverted acres and we want to be sure that land taken out of wheat and corn this year will be put to the best possible conservation use as far as practical. We feel sure that giving you an opportunity to hear your Administrator on this subject will give you renewed enthusiasm and a broader understanding of the problems which now confront us.

A travel allowance is being authorized for community committeemen who attend this meeting. We are asking that you contact other committeemen and try to make arrangements to pool rides. If you drive your own car, and are accompanied by one or more passengers, you may make a claim for 5 cents a mile. It will be necessary for you to keep an accurate record of the mileage in this event.

If you come either by bus or train, buy your ticket, and get a receipt for it. You must submit this receipt to the county office in order to be reimbursed for your fare.

You will receive a regular day's pay for attending the meeting. For community committeemen who live some distance from the Twin Cities and require traveling time which would exceed the 1 day, up to 2 days' salary will be authorized.

We feel this is an opportunity which you, as committeemen cannot afford to miss. We strongly urge you to attend this meeting.

Sincerely yours,

CHAS. W. STICKNEY,
Chairman, Minnesota PMA Committee.

ST. PAUL, MINN., March 21, 1950.

Hon. EDWARD J. THYE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED: The State PMA Committee are completing plans for our State meeting of county and community committeemen and indications are that the majority of the 4,500 local committeemen will attend.

We have been hoping that you might reconsider our invitation to attend the conference at the St. Paul Auditorium on April 4, 1950. If you are unable to be present, would you have any objection to our announcing that you had been invited to address the group and perhaps send us a telegram or message which could be read at the meeting.

Sincerely yours,

CHAS. W. STICKNEY,
Minnesota PMA Chairman.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1950.

Mr. CHARLES W. STICKNEY,
Minnesota PMA Chairman,
St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR CHARLIE: I have your letter of March 21 asking me to reconsider your invitation to me to attend the conference at St. Paul on April 4. It is with regret that I must decline this invitation as I am scheduled to be in Minnesota on Monday, April 10. I feel that I would be absent from the Senate Chamber too much if I were to accept your invitation for April 4.

I fully realize the importance of this conference and would have enjoyed very much having the benefit of attending. We who speak for and represent agriculture here in Congress are now confronted with the question of declining agriculture prices and the accumulation of surplus commodities. This, of course, brings letters expressing grave concern from those of you who administer the farm program in the field, as well as the producer who sees an ultimate threat to his own security by a curtailment of his production as well as a decline in prices. The public is becoming more critical, month by month, when reports are made of the cost factors in connection with the administration of the farm support program.

Again I say, Charlie, that it is with regret that I must decline your invitation. I wish for you, your associates, and my fellow producers in Minnesota a most successful conference. I shall look forward to receiving from you any information pertaining to specific recommendations for farm legislation and other suggestions that may be developed at your conference. I have not forgotten the depressed prices of the late twenties and early thirties and I shall endeavor to assist in maintaining a stable agricultural economy in the United States as it is the foundation of our entire national wealth.

With sincere best wishes to you and your associates,

Sincerely yours,

EDWARD J. THYE,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, PRODUCTION AND MARKETING ADMINISTRATION,
St. Paul, Minn., January 30, 1948.

DEAR COMMUNITY COMMITTEEMAN: The State committee has just completed arrangements for you to attend the second day of the annual meeting of Minnesota county committeemen to be held at the St. Paul Auditorium starting promptly at 9:30 a. m. Friday, February 27, 1948. This is the first opportunity since 1938 that community committeemen have had to attend a State-wide triple-A meeting.

Secretary of Agriculture Clinton P. Anderson and Jesse B. Gilmer, Administrator of our newly organized Production and Marketing Administration, of which you are a part, will speak. A prominent official of the State Department will discuss the Marshall plan.

You, along with others, have repeatedly asked that greater responsibility in your farm program be placed at the grass roots. This is an opportunity for community committeemen who do represent the real grass roots to hear the top man in the Department of Agriculture—the Secretary—and the man who heads our PMA organization talk about long-range agricultural plans.

Right now farmers are enjoying prosperity. There are people who think this means that the need for price supports and some other phases of the program you administer no longer exists. We know that you are disturbed about such reasoning when you run into it, and we realize that you are probably doing a lot of thinking about the future of agriculture.

The State committee recognizes, as do other PMA officials, that the farm program depends upon you being well-informed. The better understanding you have of the program, the better you are able to explain it to your neighbors, and the more successful it is in your community.

The State committee also realizes that coming to St. Paul for a meeting necessitates a great deal of travel for some community committeemen. Our budget will allow us to authorize only the payment of one day's salary for your attendance at this meeting. We suggest, however, that you discuss with your county committee the arrangements you may make for attending this meeting, so that as many as possible of you may attend with a minimum of expense and sacrifice on your part.

We urge you to attend this meeting if at all possible.

Yours very truly,

CHAS. W. STICKNEY,
Chairman, Minnesota PMA Committee.

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, PRODUCTION AND MARKETING
ADMINISTRATION,
St. Paul, Minn., January 23, 1948.

To: Chairman of County Agricultural Conservation Committee.

From: Chas. W. Stickney, chairman, Minnesota PMA Committee.

Subject: 1. State Meeting of County Committeemen. 2. Community Committeemen.

1. The State committee has arranged for the annual State meeting of county committeemen to be held at the Lowry Hotel on Thursday and Friday, February 26 and 27, 1948. All three members of the county committee are requested to attend and be present at 9:30 a. m. the first day in order that they may be registered before the first session gets under way at 10 a. m.

Arrangements have been made at the Lowry Hotel for room accommodations. In order to secure accommodations for everyone, we have been asked to furnish the management with a complete list of the persons who will stay at the hotel not later than Tuesday, February 2, 1948. Kindly complete the enclosed form and return to the State office by that date indicating whether or not rooms will be required on both Wednesday, February 25, and Thursday, February 26. We are unable to furnish you with the rates, which will vary, depending upon the number of persons in each room. A limited number of rooms which will accommodate three persons will be available. A report should be forwarded even though room accommodations will not be needed at the Lowry Hotel for any member of your committee.

County committeemen will receive $4 per diem for each 24-hour period away from home while attending the meeting. A travel allowance of 5 cents per mile is authorized if accompanied by one or more members of the county committee. If bus or train is used, a cash receipt should be obtained and the amount claimed on Form ACP-10 with the receipt attached to the February expense account forms.

2. Within the next few days we are forwarding a letter to all community committeemen authorizing them to attend the sessions on the second day of the conference to be held in the St. Paul Auditorium starting at 10 a. m. We have been fortunate in obtaining both the Secretary of Agriculture, Clinton P. Anderson, and Mr. Jesse Gilmer, Administrator of the Production and Marketing Administration to speak to the group. The State committee is asking that county committees lend every encouragement for community committeemen to attend the meeting on the 27th. We believe the message which the Secretary of Agriculture and the PMA Administrator will bring to us will be very helpful to community committeemen and will be of immeasurable assistance to them in working with farmers in their community. With the limited funds which are available for administrative expense, we cannot authorize any travel or subsistence allowance for community committeemen but will reimburse them for one day's salary for attendance at the meeting.

With county committeemen utilizing most of the available rooms at the Lowry Hotel, it is doubtful if accommodations can be obtained for community committeemen there.

However, we are informed that rooms will be available at the St. Paul Hotel, St. Francis Hotel and others and we suggest that county committeemen assist community committeemen in making reservations for them at some hotel.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield the floor.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR CAIN TOMORROW

During the delivery of Mr. HUMPHREY's remarks,

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator be so kind as to yield to me to permit me to propound a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Certainly.

Mr. CAIN. Some few minutes ago the junior Senator from Washington most willingly yielded his then right to the floor, in order that the conference report could be discussed. The natural assumption at that time was that the discussion of the conference report would not take very long.

The Senator from Washington is confronted with a problem. His own plans for the day require him to be somewhere else about 5 o'clock.

Therefore, Mr. President, I wonder whether the Senate would think it proper for me to request unanimous consent that, as the first order of business tomorrow, I may be recognized to complete my presentation of the social-security question, as it had been my intention to do this afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield, to permit the unanimous-consent request to be propounded?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes. I wish to reserve the right to object, but I understand that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. McFARLAND] may do so.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I simply wish to call attention to the fact that the plan has been to have the calendar called the first thing in the session tomorrow. Would the Senator from Washington mind modifying his request, so as to provide that he will be recognized tomorrow following the completion of the call of the calendar?

Mr. CAIN. I have absolutely no objection at all to making such a modification of my request.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I shall not object if the Senator will modify his request to that extent.

Mr. CAIN. I so modify it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection——

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me say that I have a series of questions which I should like to propound to the Senator from Georgia with reference to the bill amending the Social Security Act. If the Senator from Georgia is available this afternoon, I can propound my questions to him today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Earlier in the day the Senator from Georgia was granted leave of absence from the Senate until Monday.

Mr. HOLLAND. Then, Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, let me inquire whether there is presently available any other member of the committee to whom I could properly address questions having to do with agricultural labor and the provisions of the bill amending the Social Security Act, as the provisions of that bill would be applicable to agricultural labor.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am qualified to answer the questions; but I have given some time and study to the social security measure, and I shall make myself available to the Senator at the appropriate time.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, it happens that I shall have to leave the Senate on important and necessitous business tomorrow night, and I shall not be able to be here for several days thereafter. For that reason, I should very much like the privilege of addressing my questions a little later this afternoon to the junior Senator from Colorado, if the Senate is to remain in session for a while.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I would have no objection.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida was not here when the unanimous consent request was made, and is not familiar with its contents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the Senator from Washington yielded the floor for the consideration of the conference report, and, in the absence of unanimous consent to the contrary, or of his yielding the floor, he will regain the floor at the termination of the discussion and action with reference to the conference report. He now asks unanimous consent that he have that privilege tomorrow, at the conclusion of the call of the calendar, in lieu of having it at the conclusion of the consideration of this conference report this afternoon.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no objection at all to that, provided the Senate may remain in session for a few moments, to enable me to get from my office the series of questions which I should like to have the great privilege of addressing to the Senator from Colorado, who, I am sure, could give me the answers to them.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if I cannot do so today, I will do some more home work and have them for the RECORD tomorrow.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, my reason for suggesting that the junior Senator from Washington modify his request was that I thought it a reasonable request that he had made, inasmuch as he was to have the floor after this discussion, which it was expected would only last a short time, and was so represented. While ordinarily I do not like to agree to a unanimous-consent request that any Senator shall have the floor on the following day, I feel that this is a reasonable request, and I appreciate the willingness of the Senator to modify it, so as to have it understood that he is to regain the floor following the call of the calendar, thus enabling Senators to know when to be here for the call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, this has been one of the happiest weeks of my life. Sixteen years ago I was elected to Congress on a platform endorsing the idea of a pay-as-you-go program of old-age assistance with universal coverage.

Ever since, I have steadfastly advocated this program during my service in the House and in the Senate.

Once a year in the Finance Committee of the Senate I have presented my views to my fellow members.

This week it has been profoundly gratifying to have my Republican associates on the Senate Finance Committee, led by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the former chairman of the committee, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], the next ranking minority member, announce the conclusion of all the Republican members of the Finance Committee and several of their Democratic associates that the old-age assistance program should be as promptly as possible restudied upon a basis of universal coverage and on a pay-as-you-go plan.

To this end a resolution is being presented authorizing and directing a careful study of the situation to be made during the recess of the Congress with a view to considering the formulation of legislation adapted to the transition from the present chaotic situation to a simple universal pay-as-you-go plan.

The details remain to be worked out. The recognition of the principle, however, is of profound significance.

The report of the Hoover Commission looked in this direction and suggested strongly consideration of development along this line, and the Brookings Institution in its special task force studies for the Hoover Commission went even further.

Representatives of the Brookings Institution testified before the Senate Finance Committee this winter and strongly urged consideration of a program of this character.

The pending legislation recognizes the moral obligation of the Government to make up to those who have contributed under the current scheme for the injustice that has been done to them by the 50-percent decline in purchasing power of the dollar.

This brings home very forcibly the unsoundness of the current plan, since no power on earth is able to determine what the purchasing power of the dollar will be 10, 20, or 30 years from now.

The one thing that seems fairly certain is that it will not be what it is today.

After every great war in the last century, commodity prices have steadily declined which means that the value of the dollar has increased. Whether this will be duplicated after this war remains to be determined.

The injustice of compelling Americans to purchase "a pig in a poke" by buying future dollars on a purely speculative basis is now tragically apparent.

A pension program of this character was urged in the Republican National Platform of 1936 and in the most recent statement of Republican policies and principles issued this past winter.

It is most gratifying that the Republican leadership is now moving to implement these pledges as one of the soundest methods of restoring fiscal sanity to our Government.

Careful studies will be made of the very substantial savings that will result to all concerned with our economy as a result of this sound measure of reform.

Experience has in truth been the best teacher. Patience will have its perfect work.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks excerpts from Republican platforms, and statements on social security, and also a letter written by H. D. Ruhm, Jr., president, Bates Manufacturing Co. on April 20, 1950, to Mr. Stephen MacRae, Project Manager, Economic Cooperation Administration, dealing with the necessity of protecting the American standard of living.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM REPUBLICAN PLATFORMS AND STATEMENTS ON SOCIAL SECURITY

1936 PLATFORM

Real security will be possible only when our productive capacity is sufficient to furnish a decent standard of living for all American families and to provide a surplus for future needs and contingencies. For the attainment of that ultimate objective we look to the energy, self-reliance, and character of our people, and to our system of free enterprise.

Society has an obligation to promote the security of the people by affording some measure of protection against involuntary unemployment and dependency in old age. The New Deal policies, while purporting to provide social security, have, in fact, endangered it.

We propose a system of old-age security, based upon the following principles:

1. We approve a pay-as-you-go policy, which requires of each generation the support of the aged and the determination of what is just and adequate.

2. Every American citizen over 65 should receive the supplementary payment necessary to provide a minimum income sufficient to protect him or her from want.

3. Each State and Territory, upon complying with simple and general minimum standards, should receive from the Federal Government a graduated contribution in proportion to its own, up to a fixed maximum.

4. To make this program consistent with sound fiscal policy the Federal revenues for this purpose must be provided from the proceeds of a direct tax widely distributed. All will be benefited and all should contribute.

We propose to encourage adoption by the States and Territories of honest and practical measures for meeting the problems of unemployment insurance.

The unemployment insurance and old-age annuity sections of the present Social Security Act are unworkable and deny benefits to about two-thirds of our adult population, including professional men and women and all those engaged in agriculture and domestic service and the self-employed, while imposing heavy tax burdens upon all. The so-called reserve fund, estimated at $47,000,000,000, for old-age insurance is no reserve at all, because the fund will contain nothing but the Government's promise to pay, while the taxes collected in the guise of premiums will be wasted by the Government in reckless and extravagant political schemes.

1940 PLATFORM

We favor the extension of necessary old-age benefits on an earmarked pay-as-you-go basis to the extent that the revenues raised for this purpose will permit. We favor the extension of the unemployment compensation provisions of the Social Security Act, wherever practicable, to those groups and classes not now included. For such groups as may thus be covered we favor a system of unemployment compensation with experience rating provisions, aimed at protecting the worker in the regularity of his employment and providing adequate compensation for reasonable periods when that regularity of employment is interrupted. The administration should be left with the States with a minimum of Federal control.

1944 PLATFORM

We pledge our support of the following:

1. Extension of the existing old-age insurance and unemployment insurance systems to all employees not already covered.

* * * * *

3. A careful study of Federal-State programs for maternal and child health, dependent children, and assistance to the blind, with a view to strengthening these programs.

1948 PLATFORM

Consistent with the vigorous existence of our competitive economy, we urge extension of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program and increase of the benefits to a more realistic level; strengthening of Federal-State programs designed to provide more adequate hospital facilities, to improve methods of treatment for the mentally ill, to advance maternal and child health, and generally to foster a healthy America.

STATEMENT OF POLICY BY REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF HOUSE AND SENATE, DECEMBER 5, 1945

Government alone cannot feed the people, nor employ them, nor make the profits from which new enterprises and new jobs are born. Government can help its people to prosperity by lightening the burdens of debt and taxes, laying down the rules of fair play and protecting those whose own strength and resources are not sufficient to protect themselves.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES AND OBJECTIVES BY REPUBLICAN MEMBERS OF HOUSE AND SENATE AND REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE, FEBRUARY 6, 1950

The obligation of Government to those in need has long been recognized. Recognizing the inequities and injustices of the present program of social security, we urge:

A. The extension of the coverage of the Federal old-age and survivors insurance program, reduction of eligibility requirements and increase of benefits to a more generous level, with due regard to the tax burden on those who labor.

B. A thoroughgoing study of a program of more nearly universal coverage including the principle of pay as you go.

BATES MANUFACTURING CO.,
Lewiston, Maine, April 20, 1950.

Mr. STEPHEN R. MACRAE,
Project Manager, Arrangements Branch, Technical Assistance Division, Economic Cooperation Administration, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MACRAE: To reply in polite language to your letter of April 17, requesting our cooperation in imparting manufacturing know-how to foreign competition is extremely difficult.

Textile exports are constantly being curtailed by quotas, embargoes, tariffs, and exchange. Japanese goods are already beginning to come into the United States at prices about one-third of ours. A festival for reducing American textile tariffs still further is planned for England this summer.

On top of all this, to help some fellow employing labor at wages anywhere from 50 to 90 percent less than we pay to become more efficient appears to us to be indiscreet, to say the least.

Everyone in ECA and other parts of Washington appear to believe that we must import more if we are going to export more, and that a major portion of the imports must be textiles. Your letter requesting cooperation in bringing about our own funeral is the first opportunity our company had had to say anything or do anything about our own textile fate. Our answer is a most emphatic "No."

We have built the American textile industry into one of the most efficient in the country. Our per-man production is far ahead of any foreign country in my knowledge. You can rest assured that the textile industry will fight for its life; will fight to keep its employees' wages from being forced to foreign levels; will fight to turn out ever better products; will fight to expand its own markets, and to expand and improve its own plant. To furnish our foreign competitors ammunition with which to hurt us more and faster is hardly the common sense used by our hardier forefathers who put this country together.

Sincerely yours,

H. D. RUHM, Jr.,
President.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I desire to oppose the adoption of the conference report for the same reason that I voted against the bill in its original form, plus a few additional reasons induced by the conference report.

As I recall, the Hatch Act was passed just before I came to the Senate. It was passed for a very good reason, I think, because it was recognized that Federal employees were not only taking an active part in campaigns, but were being forced to do so by others. The Hatch Act was passed by a Democratic Congress, applying to some extent to activities of the employees of the then Democratic Government.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I think perhaps the Senator from Ohio is mistaken in what he said about the Hatch Act being passed before the Senator came to the Senate.

Mr. TAFT. My impression is that it was passed in 1938, just the year before I came to the Senate. We had it up again in 1939, I think.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Hatch Act was approved August 2, 1939.

Mr. TAFT. I was mistaken. Under those circumstances it was passed the first year I was a Member of the Senate.

Mr. LUCAS. I distinctly recall that the Senator from Ohio and I came to the Senate at the same time, and I was in the midst of the battle, on the Democratic side, fighting against the Hatch Act, and I have never been sorry that I opposed it.

Mr. TAFT. Nevertheless, it was passed in a Congress in which we had only 23 Republican Senators at that time, and it was passed because of abuses which had arisen—now the Senator reminds me—particularly in the campaign of 1938 in which I took part, and in special reference to the WPA.

Mr. LUCAS. Apparently it did not affect the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. At the time I was elected, Mr. President, I may say there were 300,000 persons on WPA in Ohio—more than there ever were before or since—and on the second day of November of that year they apparently showed very excellent judgment in their voting, although perhaps I did not receive a majority of their votes.

Mr. LUCAS. I was about to congratulate the Senator on obtaining such a large vote from WPA workers.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, the Hatch Act covers various forms of political activity. For violation of most of the activities prohibited, provision is made for the imposition of a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year. In other words, the act is made a criminal act. Only in this one case—namely, the case dealt with in section 9—was the question of removal from office brought up. It certainly must be true that the Senate considered that the particular crime prohibited by section 9 was one which deserved a summary punishment.

Section 9 (a) reads, in part:

SEC. 9. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person employed in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, to use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns. All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects and candidates.

Then the penalty section under section 9, and applying only to section 9, reads:

(b) Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person.

Mr. President, Members of Congress who wrote and who voted for the act apparently believed that these particular prohibitions were with respect to such heinous violations of political morality that compulsory punishment must be imposed in the case of any such violations. However, the conference report completely emasculates that punishment.

If it were found that the punishment was excessive, and if imposed a criminal penalty were imposed, as in the case of most of the other crimes punished by the Hatch Act—in other words, imprisonment for 1 year or a fine of $1,000, in the discretion of the court—I would not oppose this measure; I would not see why that would not be a reasonable method of dealing with the matter.

However, instead of that, the conference report proposes to give the Civil Service Commission the right and the prerogative of determining the sentence—a prerogative which, so far as I know, the Civil Service Commission exercises in no other case, and which ordinarily is the prerogative of the judge of a United States court.

Therefore, it seems to me that this provision of the conference report nullifies that particular provision of the Hatch Act, for the conference report at that point reads, as follows:

(b) If in the case of any person violating the provisions of this section it is found by the United States Civil Service Commission that such violation warrants removal he shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him—

If the Civil Service Commission feels that it warrants removal.

Mr. President, I can conceive how three members of the Civil Service Commission, no matter how heinous the crime, might feel that it did not warrant removal from office. No standard is proposed by the conference report. In it there is no suggestion by the Congress as to what shall constitute a serious violation, as opposed to a mild violation. To say that the Civil Service Commission simply must find that the offense warrants removal from office is a very indefinite provision, indeed, for the Civil Service Commission might as a matter of principle feel that no such violation would warrant removal.

I read further from the conference report:

If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. Is not that provision clearly a delegation of legislative authority to the Civil Service Commission? Can it be anything else?

Mr. TAFT. No. It seems to me that the Civil Service Commission then would determine the policy which formerly the Congress determined; in other words, the legislative policy as to whether such violations warrant removal from office. It seems to me that in the last analysis that function is more like the judicial function of sentencing a criminal and making the sentence anything which the person or group imposing the sentence wishes to make it.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. CORDON. This is not a question of sentencing a criminal; it is a question of determining the guilt of a criminal and of making the law under which that person may be found guilty. However, the Congress has not made that law, the Congress does not set, in this language, any standard; it does not even set up a mandate as to the determination of guilt. On the contrary, all that must be done by the Civil Service Commission; and that is solely in the field of the legislative, not in the field of the executive.

Mr. TAFT. I agree that it seems to me that portion of the conference report violates all the principles we have ever pursued in regard to dealing with supposed crimes.

I read again from the conference report:

If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission.

Presumably the "lesser penalty" would be a suspension.

I read further:

Provided, That in no case shall the penalty be less than 30 days suspension without pay.

Mr. President, what would a penalty of 30 days without pay amount to? In such case, the political organization for which the Government employee had worked would undoubtedly be willing to pay his salary for 30 days, and of course it would not be illegal to do so. In fact, no doubt the political organization would be glad to pay such Government worker's salary for 90 days, in order to pay for his services.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point for a question?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. STENNIS. Does not the Senator from Ohio understand, however, that the real purpose there is to cover cases of very mild violations of the rule? For instance, there was testimony before the committee in regard to a person of 18 or 19 years of age who worked in a post office in a small town, and was asked to distribute some cards for a candidate, and, in more or less a childish way, he went out on the street for a few minutes and distributed the cards. Under the law, the only penalty was absolute removal from his position. There was much evidence in regard to cases of that sort.

Does not the Senator think that the inclusion of a provision to cover such cases would be wise, and that the language of the conference report does cover them?

Mr. TAFT. I am not prepared to say, Mr. President, that the present penalty is not too severe and too automatic. It may be that it is. However, this provision of the conference report constitutes no penalty at all, for it merely says that the Civil Service Commission may suspend for 30 days, without pay, a person who has engaged in political activities, when we know he might very well be paid for his work by the political organization concerned. Such a provision would be no deterrent at all to engaging in such activities.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. STENNIS. Would not the provision requiring a unanimous vote by the Commission preclude the reasonable possibility of a case such as the one the Senator has imagined, in which political organizations would persuade Government employees to engage in such activities, and subsequently would pay their salaries for 30 days? If there were any taint of suspicion connected with a case, would not the requirement of unanimous vote by the members of the Civil Service Commission preclude such a development as the one the Senator from Ohio has imagined?

Mr. TAFT. I do not see that the requirement for unanimous vote would prevent such a development. It is true that one of the members of the Commission is required to be a Republican, as contrasted to a Democrat—or vice versa, at some other time. However, I have never felt that the Civil Service Commission was necessarily a nonpartisan body; at least, the workings of the Civil Service Commission today seem to result in the present situation in which practically every postmaster in the United States is a Democrat, although there is always a Republican on the Civil Service Commission. So I do not think the Civil Service Commission has succeeded in keeping the personnel particularly nonpartisan.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I simply wish to say that I am receiving complaints from my section of the country that occasionally the register seems to be filled with Republicans.

Mr. TAFT. Of course, in that case the register frequently is passed over entirely, and a new examination is held, and perhaps that process is repeated, until the first three persons whose names are on the register and who are qualified are Democrats; at least, that charge has been made.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TAFT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. I may say to the Senator that my question may be duplicating something which has already been discussed. It happens that I was in the Chamber a portion of the time during the earlier discussion. I was much interested in the point I thought the Senator from Ohio was making, and I wanted to be sure I understood what it was. Therefore I should like to ask the Senator whether this was his point with respect to the situation referred to in the sentence of the conference report which reads:

> If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission:

May I have the Senator's permission to recite what I understand his point to be, and ask him whether I am correct in my understanding?

Mr. TAFT. That was the point I made at that time. I have not made it in this speech. My point here is that, even assuming this penalty follows automatically, 30 days' suspension is no penalty at all. The other point——

Mr. DONNELL. I did not hear the Senator's discussion on the latter subject, which he is now mentioning, but I should like to ask whether this was the point he discussed, possibly a half hour or an hour ago: A person violates the provisions of section 9 of the Hatch Act, and is found to be guilty of an offense. There then arises the question of what punishment is to be imposed. If either three or two members of the United States Civil Service Commission vote to remove the offender from his position or office, he is removed. If, however, only one member votes to remove the offender from his position or office, he is not removed. There then arises the question, Shall a lesser penalty be imposed? The only authority found in the conference report for the imposition of the lesser penalty is contained in the language, "If the Commission finds by unanimous vote that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission." The "unanimous vote" for a lesser penalty cannot be obtained if the one member of the Commission adheres to his vote that the offender shall be removed. Therefore, under this situation, first there is no provision in the conference report by which a penalty less than removal can be imposed; second since there is not a majority of the Commission in favor of removal, therefore the offender cannot be removed. Consequently, under the conference report, under the circumstances supposed, the offender can neither be removed nor punished by a lesser punishment.

Mr. TAFT. I think the Senator has stated exactly the point I made. There was no such objection to the original Senate bill. The original Senate bill retained the automatic removal, but said, "If all three members of the Commission find that the action of the employee does not warrant removal, then they may impose a lesser penalty." But the conference report in the first place says that he cannot be removed at all, unless a majority of the Civil Service Commission find that his offense warrants removal; which is something entirely in their judgment, with no standard of any kind fixed. So that the conference report in this regard is far worse.

The Senator has illustrated one point as to which not only is the penalty reduced to a 30-day suspension, but the penalty apparently is entirely removed, if it happens that two members of the Commission think the act of the employee does not warrant removal and one member of the Commission thinks it does. Under those circumstances, as I read the conference report, there is no remedy, there is no penalty, at all.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Ohio may yield to me for a brief statement, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TAFT. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I thoroughly concur with the Senator from Ohio in his conclusion. Under the circumstances recited in the question which I addressed to him, it seems perfectly clear to me that the conference report provides no penalty whatever. I thank the Senator for permitting the interruption.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I think the conference report should be rejected, and that in dealing with this question, in this particular respect, probably a criminal penalty of $1,000 and a year's imprisonment, similar to that imposed on other violations in other sections of the act, should be substituted for this delegation to the Civil Service Commission of complete discretion as to whether anything shall be done.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I should like to propound a unanimous-consent request. I ask unanimous request that the conference report under consideration be voted upon on Wednesday next at 1 o'clock, the time to be equally divided between the proponents and opponents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the purpose to ask unanimous consent that, after an hour of debate on Wednesday, the time to be equally divided between proponents and opponents, the conference report shall be voted on?

Mr. McFARLAND. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to be sure I understood the request. Does the Senator mean there would be 1 hour's debate, between 12 o'clock noon and 1 o'clock, or does he mean that the Senate shall convene at 11 o'clock a. m., thus giving an hour on each side? Which does the Senator intend?

Mr. McFARLAND. We will make it 1:30.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest it be 1 hour after the quorum is obtained, or something of that kind. That is what the Senator really wants, is it not?

Mr. McFARLAND. That would be agreeable. I ask unanimous consent that, 1 hour after a quorum is obtained, on Wednesday next, the conference report under consideration be voted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And with that hour to be divided equally between the opponents and proponents of the measure?

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I inquire as to whether that request meets with the approval of the junior Senator from Florida?

Mr. McFARLAND. I thought the Senator from Florida was on the floor.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The junior Senator from Florida stated distinctly he would be here on Wednesday; that he would not be here on Tuesday, but would be, on Wednesday.

Mr. CORDON. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. McFARLAND. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, June 16, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the supreme source of all wisdom and power, grant that in these days of crisis and confusion we may have a faith that is calm and courageous, a hope that is invulnerable and invincible, a love that never falters nor fails.

May we be blessed with that deeper insight which discerns and knows how to interpret Thy divine will. May we not be afraid to make trial of that which Thou dost command.

Give us a clear mind for truth and reality. May we look at the issues and problems which confront us in a common-sense way. May none of our actions and decisions run counter to that which is right and reasonable.

Guide us by Thy spirit in finding practical and promising ways of meeting the needs and ministering to the welfare of all mankind.

In Christ's name we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, June 13, 1950, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carrell, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2440) entitled "An act to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 3181) entitled "An act to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. MAYBANK, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. FLANDERS, and Mr. BRICKER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8198) entitled "An act to provide for the organization of the Army and the Department of the Army, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. BYRD, Mr. CHAPMAN, Mr. SALTONSTALL, and Mr. CAIN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4295) entitled "An act to provide certain benefits for annuitants who retired under the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, prior to April 1, 1948," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. FREAR, and Mr. LANGER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 21) entitled "Joint resolution to provide for the utilization of a part of the unfinished portion of the historical frieze in the rotunda of the Capitol to portray the story of aviation," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GREEN, Mr. STENNIS, and Mr. LODGE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 50–25.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. WOOD rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his grounds.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, recently Drew Pearson in a published article of his charged me with having been connected with the receipt of an illegal fee in a matter in connection with my work in the Congress, and I desire to make reply.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send the article to the Chair?

Mr. WOOD. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the article. The gentleman may proceed.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, in the press of Monday, June 12, and again on Tuesday, June 13, Drew Pearson, in his syndicated column, has attacked me and made certain charges against my official integrity and my personal character to which I feel reply should be made—not only for the enlightenment of the Members of this body in which I have served and been honored with evidences of trust and confidence, but also that the people I serve and love, and who have honored me, may know the facts.

It is, I believe, significant that these attacks against me have been timed on the very eve of a primary election in my State and district, which is less than 2 weeks away.

In the June 12 article, headed "Pearson asserts Representative JOHN WOOD'S office collected an illegal fee," he recounts his unsupported version of a transaction between an attorney, Carl Tallant, and one Mack Stanfield, father and legal guardian of Ralph Stanfield, who suffered injuries when hit by an Army truck almost a year before I came to Congress.

His second article of June 13, entitled "Servant's United States Job Revealed," takes me to task for appointing as janitor of the Committee on Un-American Activities a Georgia Negro, William Fowler, whose wife has been employed in my home for approximately 20 years, and who himself has worked for me and does now. Prior to my coming to Congress, William Fowler was employed by an industrial plant in my home town. His wife did not want to come here without him, so I brought them both. They occupied the quarters provided where I live.

I took over the chairmanship of the Committee on Un-American Activities in July 1945 after my arrival here in January. There was a Washington man serving as janitor of the committee. With the consent of the committee I replaced him with this Georgia man from my home town at the same identical salary the Washington resident was receiving. He served until the Republican Party took over control of the Congress in January 1947, and made an excellent janitor.

In view of the many anguished wails which this man Pearson has mouthed about the benighted status of the Negro race in my State, as well as other Southern States, his criticism of my action in giving this Georgia Negro a job, the duties of which he performed so excellently, comes with poor grace.

Aside from the distorted conclusions in his article of June 12, there are certain specific charges which involve me and which are absolutely untrue.

After an absence of 10 years I came to this Congress in January 1945. Because of the fact that the district I serve is largely rural, comprising 18 counties, and the further fact that the constant lengthening of the sessions of the Congress, necessitating my absence from the district, I made an agreement with a young attorney named Carl Tallant to take over my home office at Canton and keep it open every day for the benefit of the people of the district and particularly veterans and their dependents, who might desire personal contact in connection with problems in which they were interested involving the Government or any of its agencies. I placed him on my clerical payroll at a salary of $700 per year.

For many years prior to that time I had been practicing law alone and had considerable business then pending in the courts.

I therefore made a partnership arrangement with him to aid me in such legal work as I could engage in without sacrificing my duties here and to share in the small remuneration thus received. That arrangement between us still exists.

As the years have passed, the work load which Mr. Tallant has carried in connection with my work on behalf of the people in my district has grown in volume to the point that it occupies the greater portion of his time. He uses his personal automobile in traveling over the district, employs and pays a stenographer, maintains and keep open the office 365 days out of the year, and makes frequent visits here to Washington during the sessions. I have consequently increased his clerical pay until now he is on the pay roll at a base salary of $4,500 per annum. In this connection it might be of interest to observe that I am one of the few Members of this Congress who is not using all the clerical allowance which is available under the law. On yesterday I asked the disbursing office to give me the exact figures as to how much of my allowance for the fiscal year ending the 30th of this month has reverted to the Treasury because I have not used it. It amounts to $2,903.24. This sum of the taxpayers' money I could have assigned to any person I might choose, but I have not needed it, and therefore have not used it.

The first knowledge I had of the Stanfield case referred to in the Pearson column was during the year of 1947, when I received from Attorney Carl Tallant a volume of documentary evidence in affidavit form, indicating that on January 23, 1944, almost a year before I entered the Congress, the minor son of Mack Stanfield, of Tate, Ga., was severely injured as a result of being struck by an Army truck, and that the Army had failed to compensate him for his injuries or consequent medical and hospital expenses, and requesting that I assist him in his efforts to obtain some remuneration. After some fruitless negotiations, I introduced a special bill on the subject which was reported favorably by the committee and passed by the Congress, awarding the sum of $10,000 to be paid to the legal guardian of the injured boy. I thereupon closed my file on the case.

The next time the matter came to my attention was approximately 2 months ago when I was informed that the man whom the CIO and Drew Pearson are sponsoring, in an effort to prevent my return to Congress, were whispering around the district that I had profited by this transaction. I then made inquiry of Mr. Tallant and the probate judge of Pickens County, Ga., where Stanfield resides, and found that, in addition to locating, and obtaining affidavits from, the witnesses to this transaction, Mr. Tallant also represented the parties in the probate court, obtaining the appointment of a guardian for this boy and posting bond in order that the money provided in the bill could be paid over and that this guardian paid to him a fee of 10 percent, or $1,000, for his legal services. These facts are borne out by the sworn statement of Carl Tallant, as follows:

CHEROKEE COUNTY, GA.

Before me the undersigned attesting officer personally appeared D. Carl Tallant, who on oath deposes and says as follows:

I am on the clerical staff of Congressman JOHN S. WOOD, in charge of his home office at Canton, Ga., in his absence, and performing such duties throughout his district, comprising 18 large counties, as he assigns to me in connection with the operation of his office. I use my personal automobile and keep and pay a stenographer to aid me in this work. I am also an attorney engaged in the general practice of law whenever I obtain employment which does not interfere with performance of my work for Congressman WOOD. When he is in the district he assists me in such legal work as does not conflict with the duties of his office and we share the small remuneration it brings.

On January of 1944 a youth named Ralph Stanfield was struck by an Army truck and severely injured. More than 2 years later the father of this boy came to me and stated that the Government had not paid anything for this boy's injuries, and hospital and medical care, and asked me to handle the case for him. I immediately took the matter up and spent considerable time locating and interviewing witnesses and securing affidavits which I mailed to Congressman WOOD requesting that he see if anything could be done about it. He introduced and obtained passage of a special bill for $10,000 for the relief of this boy. It was provided in the bill that the money be paid the boy's legal guardian. I represented him in the probate court in Pickens County, Ga., and obtained the appointment of his father, Mack Stanfield, as his guardian, posted bond and had letters of guardianship issued necessary before payment of money provided in the bill could be made. Immediately when this money was paid over to Mack Stanfield, the father and guardian of this boy, he came to my office and volunteered to pay me for my services the maximum amount allowed in the bill, namely 10 percent, and he gave me a check for $1,000 payable to me individually. A photostatic copy of such check is attached hereto initialed by me. On my income-tax return for that year I listed it as a separate item of my own, and paid income tax on it. Congressman WOOD had no knowledge of the arrangement I had with Mr. Stanfield and no interest in the fee I received.

Pay to the order of D. Carl Tallant $1,000.

One Thousand and no/100--------Dollars

For attorney fee.

MACK STANFIELD,
Guardian Ralph Stanfield.

[Endorsement]

D. CARL TALLANT.

This is sworn to before a notary public.

In the years of my life I have not known a more honorable or trustworthy person than Carl Tallant. It would be absolutely foreign to his every instinct to accept compensation from any person which he did not feel he had earned. Now, ignoring the unsupported conclusions spawned in the distorted mind of this scandalmonger, Drew Pearson, as set forth in his column, I desire to make specific reply to his direct statements and insinuations which reflect on me, as heretofore indicated.

Mr. Speaker, I charge categorically that when Drew Pearson stated that Mack Stanfield said that Charles Holcomb, my then secretary, suggested that part of the $10,000 represented in this bill should be paid to me, he uttered a malicious lie. I further solemnly charge that he lied when he said that Carl Tallant suggested that it was customary to pay 10 percent on compensation bills of this kind.

I further solemnly assert that his unsupported statement that I made any request that the matter be kept quiet, is a wicked and malicious lie. I likewise assert that his unsupported statement that I have ever sought to obtain possession of this check is a wicked and gratuitous lie. In support of these assertions I read an affidavit made by Mack Stanfield.

CHEROKEE COUNTY, GA.

In person before the undersigned attesting officer appeared Mack Stanfield, who on oath deposes and says as follows:

I am the father of Ralph Stanfield, and I have read the article by Drew Pearson attacking Congressman JOHN S. WOOD carried in the June 12 issue of the Atlanta Journal.

I have made no statement to a representative of Drew Pearson or to anyone that Charles Holcomb made any suggestion that any part of the money obtained under the special bill introduced by Congressman WOOD for the relief of my son should be paid to Congressman WOOD. Since this fee has been paid I have never made any statement to the effect that Congressman WOOD asked me to keep the matter quiet. In fact I have not discussed the matter with Congressman WOOD since that time until now. Congressman WOOD has never sent any person to me for the canceled check representing this fee, and so far as I know has never seen it. The check is now in my possession.

The fee which I paid as guardian for my minor son to D. Carl Tallant was a perfectly legitimate fee for services he rendered and was entirely satisfactory to me.

Dr. Winston E. Burdine, his brother, and a stranger to me have visited me. They obtained from me the check representing this fee, and have tried to obtain my signature to a statement in connection therewith.

This statement is made in order that the full facts may be known.

MACK STANFIELD.

Notary Public.

My commission expires February 21, 1954.

Mr. Speaker, one of the penalties that attaches to being in public life is that of being subjected to condemnation and abuse. With that I do not quarrel. But it ought not to be in the public interest that a man in public office should be forced to suffer the slanders and falsehoods of one whose stock in trade consists of a wicked heart, a lying tongue, and a poisonous pen. And so, Mr. Speaker, I have deemed it to be my duty to my every attachment, family, friends, my colleagues here in the Congress, and my country to take this floor and condemn this dirty slander peddled by this arch liar and character assassin through his column carried by many newspapers throughout the land.

Mr. Speaker, there is not a truth about this whole matter that I would wish unknown to all men, for it is full information that will bring complete conviction of the rectitude of my conduct, and I trust that my colleagues find no fault with me for refusing without lifting my voice in protest, to be slandered to death by this rogue who has built his name upon the wreckage of the reputations of others that he has wrought.

As to the propriety of Drew Pearson and his colleagues in the CIO coming into my congressional district, and taking over the fight being conducted against me, is something that the voters of the district will take care of on June 28. I would like to say, however, for the enlightenment of the man opposing me, and who is doubtless responsible for the employment of the talents of Drew Pearson in his behalf, that if he should ever come to this Congress by reason of the management and support of this man Pearson he will come as his slave, required to carry him, to fan him, to feed him, and to tremble when he frowns. It is all too fresh in the minds of the people of Georgia how a few years ago, under the Arnall regime in our State, Drew Peason stood on the steps of our State capitol and sought to dictate to our people how to run their local affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I am not the first to have been slandered by this villian, nor am I the first to condemn him. He has been slandering people high and low, great and small, for years. This is his profession—and he has been condemned by millions of people upon whom he has unjustifiably inflicted injury.

The late Mr. Roosevelt, while President of the United States, denounced him as a chronic liar; so has the present occupant of the White House. More than 70

Members of the Congress have publicly declared him to be a malicious liar, and twenty-odd Senators have done likewise, including both Senators from my own State. The senior Senator from Georgia spoke of him some time ago as a congenital liar. Just recently our junior Senator from Georgia, referring to him, said that some people might doubt the propriety of the President referring to Drew Pearson publicly as an s. o. b., but that nobody had shown the slightest inclination to question the truthfulness of what the President said.

Mr. Speaker, Drew Pearson heads a group who, for many years now, have made it their business to destroy public confidence in public officials, which confidence is the very bedrock of the continuance of a free republic.

On January 14 this year he published a scurrilous attack on Hon. J. Joseph Donahue, United States attorney, who was at that very moment engaged in prosecuting for perjury one Harry Bridges, one of the most notorious Communist leaders and Russian agents in America today.

The chief legman and stooge of Drew Pearson today is one David Katz, a former member of the staff of the Daily Worker of New York, the official publication of the Communist Party in America. I am unable to ascertain positively whether this man Katz is one of Pearson's henchmen who have been riding around my district with my opponent trying to dig up something with which to smear me or not.

Drew Pearson has consistently misrepresented, slandered, and abused every person—man or woman—who, because of love of country and constitutional liberty, have raised their voices against the spread of alien ideologies and against those who would overthrow our form of government. He has been the most effective weapon that the Stalinites have been able to use in America for the undermining of our whole constitutional system. To him there is nothing under the heavens that is sacred. He befouls and means to befoul everything he touches. He occupies the unique and unenviable position today of standing alone at the very pinnacle of all the slanderers and scandalmongers in all of American history.

ESTATE AND GIFT TAXES

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I have filed this morning a report on House Joint Resolution 480, the same being a joint resolution to extend the time for the release, free of estate and gift tax, of certain powers of appointment in the case of the estate and gift taxes. The resolution provides for this extension of 1 year from June 30, 1950, to June 30, 1951.

I am making this statement because of the fact that I expect to request unanimous consent for the consideration of this resolution in the next day or so.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMP. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. That was reported out by the unanimous vote of the committee?

Mr. CAMP. It was reported by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Ways and Means. There is no objection there to it.

PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute for the purpose of inquiring as to the program for next week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts, will tell us the program for next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I will be glad to.

On Monday the Consent Calendar will be called. There will be no other business that day, and no suspensions.

On Tuesday the Private Calendar will be called. Then we will take up House Resolution 635, relating to the creation of a special committee to investigate campaign expenses. This is the usual resolution adopted every 2 years. Following that will be House Resolution 323, to create a select committee to study food products.

I have bracketed Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday together. The first measure to be considered will be House Joint Resolution 334, relating to participation of the United States in certain international organizations. On last Monday we adopted the rule providing for the consideration of this joint resolution.

Following that will be a bill from the Committee on Armed Services, S. 2269, authorizing the enlistment of aliens in the Regular Army.

There is no further program for next week that I know of, with the exception, of course, that if the Committee on Rules should report out a rule on any bill, it will be programed for next week. Of course, adequate notice will be given to the leadership and to the House generally. I doubt if there will be anything, but if there is, it will not be any important bill.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand it, there are to be no suspensions on Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is correct. Of course, conference reports may be taken up at any time. We cannot tell when they will be reported.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. JUDD. Does the majority leader think it is likely there will be a return of this rent-control bill to the House in view of the rejection of it by the other body, and asking us to take another vote on it, rather than send it to conference—at least so the papers report.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sorry, I am not in a position to advise the gentleman from Minnesota as to that. I wish I were, but I am not.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HALLECK. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I understand the Committee on Rules has granted a rule on a bill providing for certain guaranties by the Export-Import Bank on foreign investments. When will that legislation come up?

Mr. McCORMACK. That will not come up until the early part of July. That is the other part of point 4. It will probably come up on July 11—not until sometime in July and probably July 11.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. ADDONIZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CROOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALTER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

[Mr. CROOK addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. JACKSON of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes today, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

THE TIDELANDS CASE

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a statement by one of my constituents with reference to the tidelands case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, June 5, the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a decision in what is commonly called the tidelands case, which, in my judgment, is contrary to the law and the facts as adduced by the representative who argued that case in behalf of my own native State of Texas.

The proper officials are filing a motion for rehearing, to be considered by the Court at some future date. It is my earnest hope that the Court, upon reconsideration of the principles heretofore announced in that case, will reverse itself and establish again the rights of all States to their own dominion within their own borders. In the meantime I shall continue my efforts to secure passage of legislation through the House to quitclaim the Federal claims to the States. I hope the House will pass the bill as it has done on two previous occasions, once in the Seventy-ninth Congress which was vetoed, the other in the Eightieth Congress upon which the Senate failed to act.

One of my constituents, a native of Denmark, but who is now a citizen of my district, has presented to me and is offering for the consideration of this Congress and the whole country his views on the propriety of the decision. His views are well worthy of consideration by every Member of this Congress and every thinking citizen, notwithstanding they were rejected by the Solicitor General when tendered to him.

The arguments of my constituent in support of his position demonstrate careful and intelligent study of the problem and a sincerity of conviction that evidence his stanch character.

The statement is as follows:

To the Honorable Members of the United States Supreme Court.

Honorable Justices of this exalted Court: Gentlemen, I have come before you, presenting this document, pleading this case as an individual.

You may dispute my legal right to do so, you may argue that you have no precedent of any individual's doing so. But, honorable gentlemen, does it take precedents to establish rights?

This case is the United States versus Texas, the United States seeking to gain control and ownership of the Texas tidelands, which I shall prove to you without doubt belongs to Texas.

Honorable Justices, gentlemer of the Court, may it please you to know that the State of Texas consists not merely of so much land and water inside certain boundaries, but it consists also of thriving industries, happy homes, fine schools financed by the revenues of the tidelands, and most of all, of the millions of loyal Texans, of which I am proud to claim to be one. When suit is entered against the State, it concerns all its citizens, every citizen is on the defensive. We are all individual stockholders in that great Commonwealth, and as individual citizens, this suit concerns any and all of us. Therefore, this suit is entered against my individual rights and interests, and I therefore have a right to appear in and before this Court in defense of those rights.

Honorable Justices, gentlemen, the decision in this case concerns not only the State of Texas and its citizens, but also all of the other States in the Union. It will have tremendous importance upon future actions.

If the United States Federal Government can claim the established title to the Texas tidelands, then, gentlemen, it can claim ownership of all other mineral resources, be they found below lakes, streams, or under State-owned property or individual homesteads. No citizen will then be secure in his long-established rights, the rights he holds under the Constitution.

May it please this Court for me to proceed with the proofs of this case; but to fully understand all the facts, a brief preliminary discussion will be in order.

The Colonies that later rebelled against tyrannic power and rules and formed this great Nation, of which we are all free and equal citizens, were settled by sturdy freedom-loving stock, the brave, hardy pioneers that faced hardship and danger, fought the savages, and conquered the wilderness, who rebelled, as all freemen will, when those in power usurped their rights.

"So when the revolution came, the people of each State became, themselves, sovereign, and in that character held and do so hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters and the soil under them for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the general government."

The above statement has already been settled a long time ago by this exalted Court in the case of Martin v. Waddell (16 Pet. 367, 410), tried before the United States Supreme Court in 1842.

Honorable gentlemen of this Court, does the above ruling not show plainly that the United States Government holds no right to State lands whatever?

Then, again, this same Supreme Court made another decision favoring State ownership in 1844, in the case of Pollard v. Hagan (3 How. 212, 229), as follows:

First, "The shores of all navigable waters, and the soils under them, were not granted by the Constitution to the United States but were reserved to the States respectively."

And second, "The new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States."

Honorable Justices of this Court, may it please you to scrutinize the above statements carefully. The people of the respective States did not delegate any ownership except as provided for in the Constitution to the Federal Government, but retained all such ownership to State lands themselves. May I ask you, where did the Federal Government acquire rights to title of such lands, as claimed in this suit? The above-quoted opinions state plainly that these shores and lands, etc., were not granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution, and that this provision was held to apply to all other States later admitted to the Union.

Now, gentlemen, honorable Justices, let us see what the Constitution provides:

As any child in school will know, the Constitution provides, "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, or prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The above, honorable gentlemen, should be sufficient to prove that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has absolutely no valid claim to any State lands, navigable streams, or submerged lands within the State boundaries, that being by the Constitution reserved to the States.

The State of Texas was settled by sturdy Anglo-Saxon stock, a race that never tolerated tyranny and oppression, a race of people that held liberty in greater value than life itself. A law-abiding race, a race of homebuilders and sturdy pioneers. They tried in vain to conform to rules and laws laid down by the Governments of Spain and Mexico; they tried to be loyal. But when tyrannic rulers ignored their rights and trampled upon their individual liberties they, as their forefathers at Lexington and at Concord had done, rebelled. They gave their lives and sacrificed their all at the Alamo; they were massacred at Goliad. They fought and won at the glorious dawn of San Jacinto, and Texas was forever free. They formed the independent nation, the republic of Texas, and established its boundaries, and the independence of Texas was recognized by England, France, Holland, and Belgium. And also by the United States.

These boundaries were described as follows: "Beginning at the mouth of the Sabine River and running west along the Gulf of Mexico three leagues (10½ miles) from shore, to the mouth of the Rio Grande, etc." The above facts were stated before the United States Senate at the time that august body adoped a resolution to recognize the republic of Texas and its boundaries, on March 2, 1837.

For 10 years Texas valiantly defended those borders, establishing beyond doubt its sovereignty.

Now, honorable Justices of this Court, the above shows conclusively that Texas won her title to her boundaries as stated above, by international law of conquest and dominion, she being first to claim dominion over the tidelands three leagues out into the Gulf. Texas has never surrendered that title to the Federal Government. May I ask you honorable gentlemen, where did the Federal Government obtain its claim for that title?

May it please the Court to know, that Texas retained the Spanish law with regard to minerals, by which all minerals found in lands within the boundaries of the republic were reserved by the republic. And, gentlemen, after joining the Union, Texas still retained that law, which plainly gives Texas ownership of all minerals under submerged lands, three leagues from shore.

The people of Texas, being mostly of Anglo-Saxon stock and having their root in the United States, desired to be annexed to the Union. A treaty was drawn up in 1844 and signed by the two sovereign nations. It defined that the United States would take over all of the public debt of Texas, in return for which Texas would surrender all of its public lands and mineral rights. The United States Senate defeated this treaty upon the grounds that the public lands of Texas consisted mostly of swamps filled with frogs and alligators and of no value at all. Strange that these lands have become so valuable at present that the Federal Government will enter suit to gain ownership to that which was offered it and which was so brusquely refused.

So it was decided to let Texas keep her worthless lands and swamps and pay her debt herself out of proceeds of sale of this worthless property. By a joint resolution of Congress, it was finally agreed that Texas should pay her own debt and retain all of her lands. The resolution reads as follows:

"That Congress doth consent, that the Territory of Texas and rightfully belonging to the Republic of Texas"—

Mind you, honorable gentlemen of this Court, the resolution reads, "rightfully belonging to Texas." There was no doubt in the minds of the supporters of that resolution, that these lands rightfully belonged to Texas—"may be created into one State called the State of Texas—in order that the same may be admitted as one State of this Union and the Constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be laid before Congress for its final action—said State, when admitted to the Union, after ceding to the United States of America all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, etc., and all other means for defensive purposes of Republic of Texas, shall retain all her public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of any kind, which may belong or may be due or owing to said Republic of Texas. And shall also retain all her vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits."

Honorable Justices of this Court, mark this plainly: "all her vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits (or boundaries, which were designated three leagues from shore). Is that not plain as day, that Texas held the title to the tidelands?—"to be applied to the payments of debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas."

Well, honorable gentlemen of this Court, could anything be plainer? In short, the United States told Texas that she did not want any of Texas' debts or any of her lands. Texas retained these lands in order to pay the debts from the revenue of the sale of lease of these lands. After that, the resolution also stated that after the debt was paid, these public lands should be left with Texas, to do with as she decided herself.

Texas did pay her debt, honorably. She lived up to her part of the agreement. Honorable gentlemen, it is up to the Federal Government to live up to its part.

At the joint resolution of Congress a paragraph was first inserted, to the effect that Texas should surrender her mineral rights. This clause was stricken out before the resolution was adopted, and Texas retained all her mineral rights within her boundaries. What lawful claim has the Federal Government to the Texas tidelands in the face of the above facts?

In accordance with the resolution of Congress, the Republic of Texas' Congress adopted a new constitution, which was transmitted to the President of the United States and laid before that Congress, and which was passed by Congress and approved by the President on December 29, 1845.

This constitution provided that "the rights of property and of action which have been acquired under the Constitution and laws of the Republic of Texas shall not be divested, but the same shall remain precisely in the situation which they were before the adoption of this constitution."

Honorable gentlemen of this Court, let us repeat above again: "but the same shall remain precisely in the situation which they were before the adoption of this constitution." Which means three leagues from shore as the Texas boundary.

May it please this Court for me to quote a letter written by President Tyler the day before he died. The letter was written to Andrew J. Donnelson, charge de affaires in Texas, and follows: "By whatever name the agents conducting the negotiations may be known, be it commissioners, ministers, or by any other title, the compact agreed on by them in behalf of their respective countries and governments would be a treaty, whether so-called or designated by some other name. The very meaning of a treaty is a compact between two sovereign nations." Let us also consult the dictionary, which defines a treaty to be an agreement between two nations. And allow me to quote, also, as follows, from a letter from Charles H. Raymond to Ebenezer Allen, Attorney General of Texas, dated May 19, 1844: "I had a parting interview with President Tyler and the United States Secretary of State. They assured me that nothing should be wanting on the part of the executive toward ensuring to Texas her just rights after she shall have become a member of the Union."

Honorable Justices of this Court, mark this well: The people of Texas and their government believed in the integrity of the United States. They believed in the sacredness of a treaty or agreement between two nations.

Shall it be said that the Federal Government of the present day failed to honor this obligation of the past and tore up this historic agreement as another scrap of paper?

Now, honorable gentlemen and Justices of this Court, let us sum up the facts presented:

First, it has been established that the States never surrendered their public lands to the Federal Government. It has also been established that the States retained all their public lands. It has been established that Texas won her territory by the sacrifice in battle of her sons, so that the territory and boundaries rightfully belonged to Texas by conquest. It has also been established that Texas successfully defended all her boundaries while a republic for 10 years, and that she and her boundaries were recognized by the United States, Britain, France, Holland, and Belgium.

It has also been established that Texas, when annexed to the Union, retained all her public lands within her established boundaries and all her mineral rights, and that she never ceded any of these rights to the Federal Government. And it has been established beyond a doubt that a solemn agreement as to the above-mentioned facts was made between Texas and the Union, in fact, a treaty, and that Texas had faith in the integrity of the United States and its agreement and promises.

Gentlemen, honorable Justices, for you in the face of all the above-mentioned facts to render any but one verdict in this case, and that to be in favor of Texas's right to her tidelands, will be to sanction breach of contract and treaties, will be to sanction the tearing up of treaties between nations, as mere scraps of paper.

Furthermore, honorable gentlemen, the Federal Government, in the dispute about the boundary between Texas and New Mexico, showed plainly that it recognized Texas's rights to its boundaries by paying Texas $10,000,000 in settlement of lands ceded to the Union.

Honorable Justices of this exalted Court, may it please you for me to mention one more important fact: The Constitution plainly provides that the Federal Government may only obtain property from States and individuals by purchase or by condemnation, in which cases it must pay in compensation the full established value of the property so acquired. Honorable gentlemen, may I ask you what steps has the Federal Government taken toward compensating Texas for her tidelands? Without full compensation it cannot, according to the Constitution, obtain these lands.

When this great Republic of ours was founded, our freedom-loving founding fathers foresaw that times may come when unscrupulous politicians and parties in power might be wanting to foster their ideals and views upon the rest of the people, against the will of the minorities or the majorities, as the case might be. Also, they foresaw that the Federal Government might have aspirations of centralization which might interfere with the States' rights and with the liberties and rights of the individual citizens.

In order to prevent this and to preserve the Republic and the liberties of the people and the rights and privileges of Democracy, they wisely saw that some form of fundamental law, unchangeable except by amendment by the people, would be in order. They therefore drew up and enacted the United States Constitution, the grandest document ever written in the annals of history and law, the freedom's guardian of the Nation.

And to guard against violations of the rules set forth in the Constitution, they instituted the Federal Courts and especially this exalted and venerated tribunal, the Supreme Court of the United States.

Honorable Justices, gentlemen, upon your shoulders rest great responsibilities. You are the guardians of justice, rights, and the liberty of our people and the preservation of Democracy and of the Republic. Upon your decision may rest the future of our Nation. So I plead with you in this case, weigh the evidence presented carefully, judge carefully the great principles involved, and let your decision be based solely upon justice. And justice is plainly outlined by the facts I have presented.

It has been argued that the Federal Government needs the tidelands for defensive purposes. No one disputes the rights which the Federal Government has in wartime to appropriate the entire resources of the Nation, but honorable members of this Court, may I ask you, has not the Constitution provided abundantly for such emergencies? The rights of the Federal Government in war are not the same as in peace. And gentlemen, there are no more loyal people in the Nation than the Texans. Texans took a most active part in the past two wars. Texas young men's blood reddened the battlefields. They fought bravely, side by side with comrades from other States. Their mothers' hearts bled as profusely as those of any other State. Texans gave freely of her wealth and her resources. And if, which God forbid, war again should curse our Nation, Texas and Texans would be among the first to rally to the cause. The Constitution has amply provided for any and all emergencies. Why should any more controls be needed?

Honorable judges, gentlemen, fellow citizens; I am but one of the common people, but it is of us the common people that this great Nation is composed.

I was born upon foreign soil. My birthplace was in Denmark, across the sea, and I am proud of it. My birthplace was the cradle of Anglo-Saxon civilization. But I am also an American citizen, and I am proud of it. I love and honor this, my adopted country, its free institutions, its great traditions, and I am ready at any time to defend and protect it against the enemies from abroad as well as those who bore from within. I revere our Constitution, and I am always ready to defend its grand provisions.

I am proud of our flag, its red the symbol of the blood that stained the snow at Valley Forge, that reddened the poppies in Flanders Field and freely flowed from Normandy to Okinawa; its white, the symbol of purity and noble aspirations of peace and of good will to man; its blue, the hope of the oppressed, the bright aims of its preservers; its stars blazing proudly in the firmament of nations and with prophetic splendor giving light of the glorious dawn of the morrow.

But honorable Justices of this Court, I am also a Texan. I love my adopted States, I revere its glorious past, I vision its wonderful future, and, honorable gentlemen, I am ready to give my life and my all for this great State. I see its Lone Star flag proudly flying; I see them fight and die at the Alamo; I view the glory of San Jacinto; in my soul resounds the battle cry of "Remember the Alamo." They fought and died for Texas, that Texas would be free. And so, Honorable Gentlemen, Justices of this Court, I have come before you to fight for Texas, to fight for the treasured rights inherited from the past, and I will not stop fighting until this battle is won and the Texas tideland title has been cleared indisputably in favor of Texas.

Gentlemen, honorable Justices, I am not here to plead for favors or for mercy, but I am here as a free citizen, to demand justice.

And, gentlemen, do not forget that there is a higher court and higher jury than you that shall judge your acts; a court that shapes the destiny of nations. And there is another court from whose might the thrones of the mighty shall crumble, the court of aroused public sentiment of a free and liberty-loving people. That court will finally decide the case, through its Representatives in Congress.

But honorable Justices, gentlemen of this Court, I plead with you to uphold the integrity of this Court. Let your verdict be founded upon justice and upon the merit of the facts presented. Then, gentlemen, I have no fear of the outcome of the verdict.

I thank you.

M. H. STOUGAARD.

HUNTSVILLE, TEX.

TO CONFIRM AND ESTABLISH TITLES OF THE STATES TO LANDS BENEATH NAVIGABLE WATERS

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged resolution (H. Res. 651), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in view of the report just made from the Rules Committee on H. R. 7873, I would like to announce to the House that I am assigning that also for next Tuesday. That is H. R. 7873. I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may again report the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the title of the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is that the resolution which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] just reported from the Rules Committee?

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I assure the House that I am not endeavoring to run over the tideland bills on you. I reported merely what the Clerk handed me.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is probably a good thing I called attention to it.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman may withdraw the report.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might state that the bill (H. R. 7375) authorizing the General Services Administration to construct a building for the Social Security Administration was reported out of the committee. I will ask the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to state what the bill is.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The bill authorizes the General Services Administration to construct a building for the Social Security Administration. A similar bill was reported in the Eightieth Congress but never passed. A rule on that bill has been reported by the Rules Committee and I understand they will submit it later today.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, may I make this observation?

The action of the gentleman from Virginia came about as the result of a mistake of the Clerk. We have agreed to report the bill but subject to the approval, of course, of the gentleman from Ohio, and also my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, who was not able to be present when the vote was taken I understand they have agreed to it and that the rule is in order.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I state, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that if a rule is reported out on the bill H. R. 7873, I will program it for next week—for Tuesday if it is reported out today—but, in any event, I will confer with the leadership on the Republican side.

CONSTRUCTION OF BUILDING FOR THE BUREAU OF OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS INSURANCE

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 651, Rept. No. 2246), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7873) to authorize construction of buildings for the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance, and for other purposes. That after general debate which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Works, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EXTENSION OF HOUSING ACT OF 1947

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3181) to extend the Housing and Rent Act of 1947, as amended, and for other purposes, with a House amendment thereto, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. SPENCE, BROWN of Georgia, PATMAN, HAYS of Arkansas, WOLCOTT, GAMBLE, and KUNKEL.

INCREASING BORROWING POWER OF COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House on the bill (H. R. 6567) to increase the borrowing power of Commodity Credit Corporation may have until midnight tonight to file a conference report and statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON BANKING AND CURRENCY

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking and Currency may have until midnight Friday, June 16, 1950, to file reports on the bill H. R. 8737, to extend import controls on fats and oils; H. R. 8567, to extend authority for Texas City tin and smelter operations; and H. R. 8597, to permit national banks to give security for public funds.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

NATURALIZATION PRIVILEGES EXTENDED TO CERTAIN IMMIGRANTS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to provide the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all immigrants having a legal right to permanent residence, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. WALTER, GOSSETT, and GRAHAM.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 3 OF THE LUCAS ACT

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3436) to amend section 3 of the Lucas Act with respect to redefinition of request for relief, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That the act of August 7, 1946 (Public Law 657, 79th Cong., 41 U. S. C., sec. 106), as amended, is further amended as follows:

"(a) By adding at the end of section 2 thereof the following new subsection:

"'(c) In determining the amount of the net loss on all contracts and subcontracts held by the claimant under which work, supplies, or services were furnished for the Government between September 16, 1940, and August 14, 1945, the respective departments and agencies shall allow as costs of performance of such contracts and subcontracts (1) all, or the properly allocable portion, of the sum paid or allowable by the claimant as reasonable compensation for services, during the period of performance of the contracts and subcontracts, to its working partners or working sole proprietor, and (2) interest at reasonable rates paid by the claimant to the date of determination of the claim on sums borrowed by him or if for the purpose of providing necessary working capital for the performance of the contracts and subcontracts. For the purposes of this subsection, the term "reasonable compensation for services" means wages or salaries which were or could have been allowed under the contract renegotiation procedure or the applicable wage and salary stabilization regulations.'

"(b) By amending section 3 thereof to read as follows:

"'SEC. 3. Claims for losses shall not be considered unless filed with the department or agency concerned on or before February 7, 1947, and unless a written request for relief, or a demand for payment of such losses, or a notice of such losses, sustained or impending, adequate under the circumstances to apprise such department or agency of the distress of the contractor was filed or submitted to such department or agency or to any of its subordinate officers on or before August 14, 1945; but a previous settlement, regardless of its nature, under the First War Powers Act, 1941, or the Contract Settlement Act of 1944, or other final action on a request for relief shall not operate to preclude further relief otherwise allowable under this act. A request for relief, or a demand for payment of losses or a notice of such losses, sustained or impending, adequate under the circumstances to apprise such department or agency of the distress of the contractor which had been submitted to or filed with a prime Government contractor by a subcontractor, or with a subcontractor by a sub-subcontractor, prior to August 14, 1945, shall constitute a proper and sufficient request for relief within the terms of this act. The form of the request for relief hereunder shall be immaterial, provided it inform the Government or the dominant contractor that a loss was being suffered, was anticipated, or had been suffered by the contractor, subcontractor, or sub-subcontractor in connection with the work in question.'

"(c) By adding at the end of section 6 thereof a new sentence, as follows: 'Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act and any amendments thereto, the Court of Claims is hereby given jurisdiction of any such petition filed in said court or transferred thereto at any time after June 25, 1948, and within the time provided by this act.'

"(d) By adding at the end thereof the following new sections:

"'SEC. 7. As used in this act, the terms "contractors," "subcontractors," and "materialmen" include individuals, partnerships, joint ventures, business associations, and corporations, and mean with respect to partnerships, joint ventures, or business associations, the partnerships, joint ventures, or business associations themselves, and not the individual members thereof.

"'SEC. 8. Any claim filed with any department or agency of the Government under this act prior to the effective date of this section shall be reconsidered and settled in accordance with this act, as amended as of such date; except that in any case in which any contractor, subcontractor, or materialman has, prior to such date, filed an action pursuant to section 6 of this act as originally enacted or as amended by section 37 of the act of June 25, 1948, the claim involved in such action shall not be reconsidered by the department or agency of the Government which originally considered such claim. Any claimant shall be permitted within 60 days after the effective date of this section to revise his claim or amend his complaint or petition and to revive his action if necessary, to seek relief in accordance with this act, as amended as of such date.'"

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to amend the War Contractors Relief Act, as amended."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CLASSIFICATION ACT OF 1949

Mr. MURRAY of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7889) to postpone the application of the Classification Act of 1949 to certain employees of the Selective Service System, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

After line 12, insert:

"SEC. 2. Section 703 (a) of such act is amended by inserting at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: 'Officers and employees who are otherwise eligible shall receive full credit under this subsection for service at the maximum authorized salary rate specified in the Bacharach Act of May 29, 1928, as amended and supplemented, and the Reed-Jenkins Act of May 29, 1928, as amended, to the same extent as if such service had been at the maximum rate of a grade of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.'"

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

1948 CENSUS OF BUSINESS FOR THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this morning I received a preliminary release from the Director of the Bureau of the Census bearing on the 1948 census of business, which shows the great progress that has been made in my State. It shows a great business expansion in our great State of Illinois from 1939 to 1948. Retail sales increased 207 percent; wholesale volume showed a 260-percent rise; service trades reported an increase from $263,000,000 in 1939 to $745,000,000 in 1948, with a large increase in employment for the 9-year period.

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, it would be worth while for all Members to read this wonderful report. I hope every other State enjoys this same degree of prosperity and will continue to enjoy it under a national Democratic administration for many, many years.

The preliminary release is as follows:

UNITED STATES
DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
June 9, 1950.

1948 CENSUS OF BUSINESS, RETAIL, WHOLESALE, SERVICE TRADES—PRELIMINARY

ILLINOIS

Retail, wholesale, and service establishments located in Illinois showed a substantial expansion in dollar volume of trade from 1939 to 1948 according to preliminary figures from the 1948 Census of Business received today by the Bureau of the Census, United States Department of Commerce.

Retail sales in the State during 1948 aggregated $8,779,000,000, an increase of 207 percent over the $2,857,600,000 sales in 1939, when the preceding census of business was taken. Wholesale sales volume in the State showed a 260-percent rise over the same period, reaching a total of $18,002,000,000 in 1948 as compared with $4,998,800,000 in 1939. The service trades included in the census of business reported receipts totaling $745,300,000 in 1948 compared with $263,500,000 in 1939. Hotel receipts moved from $69,200,000 in 1939 to $148,300,000 in 1948. Amusement businesses in the State recorded receipts of $170,200,000 in 1948 compared with $75,500,000 in 1939.

Employment in the State also rose over the 9-year period between 1939 and 1948 for the trades covered by the census of business. Retail trade establishments reported 483,841 paid employees for the workweek ended nearest November 15, 1948. Of these, 374,813 worked the full week, and the remainder part of the week. The comparable total and full workweek figures for 1939 were 353,486 and 278,844. Wholesale trade establishments reported a total of 180,055 full- and part-week employees for the week of November 15, 1948, compared with 125,848 for the same week in 1939. For the selected service trades, November 15, 1948, paid employees numbered 100,036; the comparable figure for 1939, adjusted for change in scope between the two censuses, was 77,892.

These preliminary figures have been compiled from similar releases being made available for each county in Illinois. Final figures, superseding the preliminary data for Illinois, will be included in a State bulletin to be issued in several months. Similar data will be made available in preliminary and final form for each of the States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KEEFE (at the request of Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin) for an indefinite period because of illness.

LIBERALISM: TRUMAN STYLE

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, there has come into the language of today a new set of meanings to familiar words which is confusing the public to the extent that many of these words now have the opposite meaning to their original definition. Through this confusion of word meaning, we are witnessing one of the smoothest sleight-of-hand performances ever witnessed on the national stage. Its main props are the misuse of words—an old trick with those who try to fool the public; the reversal of word meanings.

Bruce W. Knight, professor of economics of Dartmouth College, stated the question very clearly when he wrote:

> The greatest public issue before Americans today is pseudo-liberalism—false liberalism, phony liberalism, the pretended pursuit of liberal ends by means which lead in the opposite direction. In other words, are we to have liberalism or are we to have a wretched counterfeit in the form of state paternalism?

Mr. Knight has hit the nail squarely on the head.

True liberalism is bound up with individualism, which, in turn, means a reasonably sound free economy. The word "individualism" is a comparatively new word in our language. It is significant that it came into the English language about 100 years ago with a translation of Tocqueville's Democracy in America. It is thus a living part of our Republic and one of the great factors in our growth as a nation. It is the basis of all our freedom—all our liberty.

It was Herbert Hoover who said:

> Recently, in my opinion, there has been too much talk about the common man. * * * We are in danger of developing a cult of the common man, which means a cult of mediocrity. But there is at least one hopeful sign: I have never been able to find out who this common man is. In fact, most Americans will get fighting mad if you call them common. * * * It is a curious fact that when you get sick you want an uncommon doctor; if your car breaks down you want an uncommonly good mechanic; when we get into a war we want an uncommon admiral and an uncommon general. I have never met a father and mother who did not want their children to grow up to be uncommon men and women.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have summed up what I believe is the national philosophy.

Individualism and true liberalism have been the cornerstone of our national life. Today liberalism is defined by those who are using it as a cloak as something entirely different—the exact opposite of its real meaning.

Today we have a President and an administration who are crying liberalism while at the same time they are trying to stifle individualism and taking away more and more liberties from the people.

Mr. Truman has already announced that he is going to make another tour or so throughout the country before the elections this fall in order to purge those legislators who will not rubber-stamp his socialistic program. His attitude, since he has become President, is diametrically opposed to the attitude he had when he was a Senator if we are to believe a letter he wrote to the editor of the St. Louis Star-Times and published by that paper on March 6, 1944, and later printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 2, 1948, at the request of Senator KEM, of Missouri.

This letter said in part, and I quote:

> The vast majority of the legislative branch of the Government is just as hard working and just as patriotic as any other branch of the Government. * * * A little more common sense in the administrative approach to things that have to be done and a little less demagoguery for the purpose of appealing to the ignorant and uninformed would make it much easier to carry on the war effort. * * * The bulwark of free government is the elected legislative branch of the Government which holds the purse strings, and which has the power to levy taxes upon the people to meet the expense of government. I honestly think the founding fathers believed the Congress to be the most important branch of the Government or they would not have outlined its organization and its powers first in the Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, how different is this philosophy from the one expressed by the present chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Representative CANNON, Democrat of Missouri, and one of the powerful figures in the Truman administration when the appropriations bill was presented to the House of Representatives this year. This appropriations bill is Mr. Truman's bill and presented by the chairman of his party's committee. How calloused the present administration is toward the tax money paid from the sweat of every workingman and the cynical attitude expressed is to be found in Representative CANNON's words when he said:

> In one respect, Mr. Chairman, this bill may be said to be not only an appropriation bill, but a tax bill as well. There was a time when we drafted the appropriation bills on the basis of the amount of revenue we had to spend. We shaped the coat to the material available. But we have long ceased to consider appropriations from the point of view of what we have to spend. We now make the appropriations and spend the money and taxes must be levied to conform to the appropriation bills and to supply the money we have already spent. We now shape the coat to the latest fashion or caprice, and when the cloth is insufficient, we simply borrow more material, as a matter of course.

Can anything be more cynical than that? And is there any hope of balancing the budget or ceasing deficit spending and piling debt on debt when, in the words of the chairman of the Appropriations Committee the administration "shapes the coat to the latest fashion or caprice"?

But these are but surface indications of what is happening to the free economy of our Nation, to the freedom of the individual under this pseudo-liberalism of the Truman administration, an administration that has spent more money since 1945 than all the administrations from George Washington's day to 1941, the beginning of World War II. There are more sinister machinations at work under the surface.

There are three bills, which in my estimation, represent the keys to the gateway of national socialism as represented by the thinking of the Truman administration, masked under this neo-liberalism, in spite of the fact that socialism has failed in every country in which it has been tried.

It was Sir Stafford Cripps, one of the outstanding champions of socialism in England, who admitted the fallacy of socialism, when he told the people of England in presenting his program for this year:

> When I hear people speaking of reducing taxation, and, at the same time, see the cost of social services rising rapidly in response very often to the demands of the same people, I sometimes rather wonder whether they appreciate to the full the old adage that "We can't have our cake and eat it."

The first of the Truman socialistic bills is the Spence bill, known as the Economic Stability Act of 1949, H. R. 2756. This is a sleeper bill so far. You have heard very little about it since the administration is keeping it under wraps and want little publicity about it.

The Spence bill is pending in the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. The clear purpose of this bill is to impose a centrally planned economy on the United States. It runs to 42 printed pages and was introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky, Representative BRENT SPENCE, Democrat and chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. Speaker, this Spence bill is the most complete regimentation of American economy ever proposed and if it ever becomes the law of the land American socialism will have become a fact. It has rigid price-fixing powers which involve the control of all buying and selling practices, including advertising and other costs. It contains the general power to allocate goods which means complete political control over all distribution from producer to consumer. It puts the President above all existing laws and gives him power to put Government into business in competition with private industry whenever he wants to do so.

Examining this Spence bill, we find in section 104 (a):

> The administration of this act is vested in the President, who may delegate any and all authority hereunder to such departments, agencies or officials of the Government as he may deem appropriate.

Then section 104 (c) states:

> The President may issue such rules, regulations, and orders as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Now what is it that the President may do as he "deems necessary" and to delegate these powers as he sees fit?

Here comes the real purpose of American planned economy. Under section 201 (a):

> The President from time to time shall designate materials or facilities with respect to which he finds a shortage * * * and threatens to affect * * * the national security.

Note there is no limitation—only what the President finds. That could take in any business at his discretion.

But this is only the beginning. Under section 204 we find:

> Whenever the President determines it is necessary * * * he may make loans * * * to State governments or subdivisions or instrumentalities thereof for the expansion of capacity and production. Such loans may be made without regard to the limitation of existing law and on such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary.

In this section the President is put above the laws of the land. But there is more.

Under section 205 (b):

> Whenever the President determines that it is necessary * * * he may construct new plant facilities * * * for the expansion of capacity and production. Such contracts may be made without regard to the limitation of existing laws and on such terms and conditions as the President deems necessary. * * * For the purpose of this section, the President is authorized to acquire real property * * * by purchase, lease, or otherwise, as he deems necessary.

Again the President is put above the law. If he should not like the color of your hair, for instance, he could acquire your property and put you out of business. If this Spence bill had been law last year, Mr. Truman could have taken over the steel mills to make them increase their production or gone into the steel-making business as he threatened at that time.

You say it cannot happen here. It is happening under cover.

Then there is a final stinger in this bill in section 302 (e) (1). Here it is:

> The President may * * * make such inspection of books, records, and other writings, premises, and property of any person, and make such investigations * * * as may be necessary or appropriate in his discretion.

Mr. Speaker, this is undisguised police power over every business in this country.

The British War Minister, John Strachey, who has been under fire in Britain because of his pronounced Communist sympathies, knew what he was talking about when he recently informed a group of American students at Oxford University:

> The present United States administration is one of the more left-wing governments in the world today.

But this Spence bill is only one of the strait-jackets this present administration would put on every free-born American, under the guise of liberalism. It would take care of American business and its companion, the Brannan plan would take care of the farmers. It is named for Secretary of Agriculture Brannan, the same Brannan who is said to have had a hand in the Spence bill. Until this Brannan plan was proposed, farm legislation in this country had always been a bipartisan affair devised for the good of the farm industry as a whole. Its siren song is high prices for farmers and low prices for consumers. But the sleeper here is that the difference in cost of production and the cost to the consumer would be paid out of the Government Treasury from the taxes of all people—farmers and consumers alike. And it is significant that neither Secretary Brannan nor the administration can ever be pinned down on the cost of this program.

The Brannan plan is still being pushed to the limit in spite of its rejection by the Farm Bureau Federation which stated:

> The ultimate effect of such a program would be the nationalization of agriculture and the distribution system, the cost would be staggering and it would place a ceiling on opportunity in agriculture.

Experts have figured the cost anywhere from seven billion to twelve billion dollars a year.

The system of the Brannan plan runs this way. The farmer puts his products on the markets and he gets what he can for them. Then the Government pays the farmer the difference between what he gets on the open market and the price the Government sets on those products. The difference is paid out of money collected from every taxpayer and is a hidden cost in every bit of food you buy.

But there are some who believe that even this tremendous cost is not the major objection to it. There is, Mr. Speaker, the enormous job of administration and regimentation which would be the consequence of such a program. There would be rigid acreage restrictions and detailed record-keeping on some 6,000,000 farms as well as on many smaller tracts of land that could qualify for poultry, fruit, and vegetable income supports.

Did you ever hear of the CIB? It is the Compliance and Investigation Branch of the Department of Agriculture—its detective force. Right now it is made up of 146 people, 100 of whom are sleuths, working out of five field offices. Its job is to police the Government's present price-support operations. If the Brannan plan goes into effect, just multiply this force hundreds of times over.

To be eligible for supports, producers would be required to comply with allotments, quotas, and practices that would make the old AAA program look like free enterprise. A vast horde of administrators, compliance officers, bookkeepers, and clerks would be required such as the United States has never seen. Police methods would have to be used to cope with black-market activities.

For instance, if a farmer did not grow enough to qualify for maximum production allotments, there would be a strong temptation to go out into the open markets and buy enough at free prices to make up his production deficit and claim a compensatory payment on the whole allotment. Many farmers with large families could hardly afford to eat their own products. They would find it to their advantage to sell all they produce, collect their payments, and then buy back their own products in the cheaper free markets.

But the farmer would be in even deeper trouble if he did not keep proper records. My advice to anyone contemplating becoming a farmer under this Brannan plan is to take a course in bookkeeping and accounting or to hire an accountant if he wants to keep out of trouble.

Mr. Speaker, this Brannan plan is 86 pages long. And 15 of those pages relate to penalties imposed on the farmers. Let me give you just one, the provisions of section 401 (b) on page 79. This will tell what is in store for the farmers if the Brannan plan ever became law. It reads as follows:

> Farmers engaged in the production of any agriculture commodity shall furnish proof as to their acreage, production units, production yield, storage, and marketing of the commodity in the form of records, marketing cards, reports, storage or sales receipts, or otherwise as the Secretary may prescribe as necessary for the administration of this title. Any such person failing to make any report or keep any record as required by this subsection shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500, and any such person making any false report shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

There it is in black and white. The farmer will keep whatever records the Secretary may prescribe or pay a fine or go to jail or both. Is this the definition of liberalism which connotes freedom?

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota, Representative AUGUST H. ANDRESEN, a ranking Republican member of the House Agriculture Committee. He stated:

> The Brannan plan which promises prosperity to the farmers and cheap food for the consumers, rich and poor alike, is the most fantastic scheme that has ever been presented to Congress for consideration. It is not a new plan, for it has been used in every country where Communists and Socialists have gained control over the government by promising the people, if they vote right, all kinds of food and luxuries at low costs and prosperity for the farmers at the expense of the taxpayers. In England, where farmers have lost their freedom, the Socialist government paid out more than $2,000,000,000 in subsidies in 1948.

Mr. Speaker, the third bill which has been proposed is the so-called compulsory health insurance bill, commonly called the socialized medicine bill, which is just what it is. Under this plan every taxpayer would be paying with money deducted from his pay envelope, for 3 years, just to "tool" up this pink-pills-by-Government program with a horde of file clerks, administrators, and bureaucrats drawing salaries paid for by these taxpayers in the country to get ready for medical regimentation. Theoretically, doctors and patients could stay out of this plan. But private doctors would get only the well-to-do patients who could afford to pay twice for their medical care since they would already have deductions made by the Government and the other doctors who entered the plan would be so overrun by those with imaginary ills that their assembly-line medicine could not accommodate the patients who really needed their help. This compulsory plan would eventually cost from $70 to $100 a year apiece for every man, woman, and child in this country. And in the final analysis would result in good medicine for the well-to-do who could afford a private doctor and bad medicine for the wage earner who could not afford to pay twice for medical expenses with no assurance he would get the doctor or surgeon of his choice since he would have to be certified by some Government clerk before he could have treatments.

These three bills, the Spence, the Brannan plan, and compulsory health insurance, are just opening wedges for the regimentation of our people under the false guise of liberalism. It is a liberalism that gives all liberty to a centralized government and its hordes of snoopers, do-gooders, false planners, and hordes of bureaucrats regimenting every action of the American people and complete loss of the invidualism that has made us great.

Parading under this pseudo-liberalism, Mr. Truman and his administration would have the public believe that they are the true liberals fighting against so-called reactionaries when, in truth, they would destroy real liberalism and private initiative and individualism.

We are confronted with the creeping shadow of a managed economy blotting out the sun of free enterprise. Free enterprise—the right of the individual to make his own way in the world—to work at the job he likes; to grow his crops without the threat of jail sentences—made us the most powerful nation in the world today. We are the envy of the world; the one nation which alone is supporting and sustaining the other countries of the world today.

But insidious forces are at work that would sell our birthright for a mess of managed economy and managed lives.

Few nations have been overthrown by outside forces. More have been overthrown by forces within, by dry rot caused by termites who bore their way into the solid, sturdy structure until it crumbles. Those forces are at work today in the United States masking their real purposes under the guise of giving something for nothing to every segment of our population. They have offered labor a sop by their crocodile tears over the so-called "slave-labor" Taft-Hartley act. They are trying to lure the farmers through the Brannan plan without revealing the jail penalties. They are throwing a flirtatious smile at the small-business man through a guaranteed loan proposition without revealing the regimentation of the Spence bill. They make a play to the consumers through a make-believe lower grocery bill. And they make a play to all families through the medium of a socialized medicine plan concealed by the innocuous words, health insurance, while soft-pedaling the word, compulsory in the title of the bill.

But what the public should be aware of is that we are halfway to statism and socialism right now—where the State is gaining ever greater powers over the individual.

Mr. Speaker, statism is a form of a fascism where the state controls all activities under the guise of seeming to let private enterprise exist—but exist only through the benevolence of the dictator. The next step is full socialism where the state nationalizes all business. This in turn, leads to communism—the ownership of everything, including the people by the state.

In the words of a popular song, "Enjoy yourself, it is later than you think."

PLYWOOD LOG EXPORTS

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. MACK of Washington. Mr. Speaker, ECA, this week, issued a call for bids on approximately 9,000,000 feet of choice, old growth Oregon-Washington Douglas fir logs for export to Korea where these logs are to be manufactured by low-paid oriental labor into plywood and lumber.

The American lumber industry, along with all citizens, is being taxed to provide the money to ECA for the purchase of these logs. ECA will give the logs free to the Korean Government which then will manufacture these logs into finished products to compete with American plywood and lumber. If there is anything sound or sensible about this proposal I fail to see it.

Presumably this first purchase of 9,000,000 feet of our highest quality Oregon-Washington Douglas fir logs is to be followed by other purchases of logs later.

With ECA bidding with tax dollars for logs against American plywood plants and sawmills we may expect high grade logs, already scarce, to become even more scarce, and harder for American plywood plants to obtain. This will mean short closedowns by American plants, from time to time, due to a log shortage with a consequence these short close downs of plants will cause woodworkers loss of income.

We should not be exporting logs. We should keep these logs in the United States and manufacture them here into lumber and plywood. This would make jobs for American plywood and millworkers, while shipping these logs to Korea to be manufactured at low wages by orientals deprives Americans of jobs.

Canada is smarter than our American ECA. Canada has an embargo on peeler logs. She prohibits their export as logs outside of Canada, even prohibits their export into the United States. By this policy, Canada keeps her high grade logs in Canada and requires their manufacture in Canada by Canadian labor into lumber and plywood.

Lumber and plywood is an important defense material. We should not be shipping this raw material—logs—out of the United States to foreign countries any more than we should be exporting copper, zinc, or petroleum. We should conserve our logs and keep them in the United States to provide jobs for American workers. We do not do that when we export the best grade of these logs to Korea.

I have written ECA Administrator Paul Hoffman urging that he withdraw immediately this call for bids for peeler and first grade sawmill logs for shipment to Korea. I have asked that he thoroughly investigate the dangers such exports will cause to our domestic economy and to our future log supply before again considering exporting American logs to the low-wage Orient for manufacture.

PARAPLEGIC DISCOMFORT

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago at the order of the President, Birmingham Hospital in Van Nuys, Calif., was closed, and several hundred paraplegic patients were transferred to the new Veterans' Administration Hospital in Long Beach, Calif. This move has, in many cases, resulted in extreme hardship on these paralyzed veterans. At least 90 of the veterans have purchased their own homes in the Van Nuys area, which is 57 miles away from the new hospital. In order to obtain adequate treatment, these paraplegics must make a round trip of about 114 miles to get treatment. The purpose of these remarks is simply to say that I intend to introduce legislation within the next few days which will make it possible for the disabled veterans who own homes in the Van Nuys area to obtain the necessary attention at some point nearer their homes.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. CANNON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Tuesday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, on the subject The Omnibus Appropriation Bill.

Mr. COTTON (at the request of Mr. CANFIELD) was given permission to address the House for 20 minutes on Monday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. CRAWFORD asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Monday next, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered.

THE MILK SITUATION

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct your attention to the milk situation in the District of Columbia.

The present Milk Code in the District was adopted in 1925. It directs the District Health Department to inspect the dairies for the delivery of milk into the District. The old law is long and cumbersome. It was probably adequate 25 years ago, but in comparison to present conditions, it is of the horse and buggy days. It needs to be rewritten to fit the modern idea of delivering good milk to the citizens.

I propose to introduce legislation which, if enacted, will permit the dairy plants in the District of Columbia to purchase, receive, process, sell, and distribute shipments of milk from any of the 48 States, when that milk conforms with the grade A regulations as set up by the United States Public Health Service.

I realize that such a bill will meet violent opposition from the Maryland and Virginia Milk Producers' Association, because, at the present time, they have a tight monopoly on the delivery of milk in the District. They are using the present health regulations as an economic peg to better their conditions. We in Congress and the residents of the District of Columbia are interested in getting good milk at reasonable prices. This can be accomplished when we permit the dairies and others to not only receive, but bring milk into the District, which conforms to the present high standards of the Public Health Service.

I am convinced that the present strike would not have been possible, had such regulations been in existence. I am also convinced that because of the strike and the high price of milk, some milk is being delivered in the surrounding territory, that does not meet high qualifications necessary under the United States Public Health Code for milk.

It is my hope to get a hearing on this bill the early part of the week, and that such legislation can be reported to the House. The time has long passed by for bringing up to date the District regulations for handling milk and milk products.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. D'EWART. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week I attended a joint International Boundary Commission meeting in Shelby, Mont. The purpose of the meeting was to determine, if possible, a method of mutually beneficial use of the Waterton and Belly Rivers, which rise in the United States and flow into Canada. At that meeting I personally presented a statement, and statements by Senator MURRAY, Senator ECTON, and Representative MANSFIELD were read.

I ask unanimous consent to include all these statements at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

STATEMENT OF HON. WESLEY A. D'EWART, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, SECOND DISTRICT, MONTANA

Gentlemen, it is deeply gratifying to me that the International Joint Commission has come to Montana this month to give further study, on the ground, to the problem of utilizing the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers for the mutual advantage of Canada and the United States.

The men and women you have met during the past few days of your visit here, and who are discussing this matter with you, have planned and worked for 40 years to bring water to the fertile land you have seen on your field trip. Your visit here this month is evidence that we are at last making substantial progress toward the realization of their goal.

Although I have been familiar with the problem over the years, I became much more closely connected with it when I came to Congress 5 years ago. Before I left for Washington in 1945, I came up here and discussed the matter with the interested people. When I reached Washington, I found that Mr. Vallance was then working toward an agreement between our two Governments for the reference of the matter to this Commission. Over the years I have endeavored to be of help whenever the opportunity was presented, and the men of the State and Interior Departments have been good enough to keep me informed of developments so that I could report them in turn to Paddy MacHale, George Wilson, Douglas Parker and some of the others who, with reason, found it difficult to remain patient while the work proceeded so slowly.

They have urged me very strongly, from time to time, to start action on my own on a project for this area, without waiting for further negotiations, and that I think we could do. As you know, our Bureau of Reclamation has prepared a reconnaissance report which shows to my satisfaction and that of other Members of Congress familiar with it that a feasible plan can be prepared to divert most of the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers, rising in the United States, under the divide and into this area where the water would be used to irrigate some 217,000 acres of class one and two land. I believe this report has been made available to the Commission.

In brief, the plan would provide for diversion of almost the entire flow of the two rivers through a system of tunnels, reservoirs, and canals to the land where it is needed.

Forty years ago this plan might have been called fantastic and visionary. Some of us recall that the first suggestions for building the Moffat tunnel in Colorado, to bring water from the western slope under the mountains to Denver, were greeted with ridicule. But in a few years that 6-mile tunnel was built and it has been in operation for many years. Later another tunnel project of even greater length, some 13 miles, was suggested to bring additional water under the divide in Colorado. Again it was labeled fantastic, but again it was built and is operating with success. In this case we are talking of a tunnel 20 miles long. I have no doubt that we can work it out, and I have no doubt that we will do so if it becomes necessary.

As a member of the Irrigation Subcommittee of the House of Representatives, I have made it a point to attend without fail every one of our many hearings on the irrigation, reclamation, and power projects proposed for various sections of the United States. This has been my specialty. From my knowledge of other projects we have considered in recent years, I feel that we can secure authorization and appropriation for the All-American Tunnel project in Montana.

Despite some rather heavy demands from the people most concerned, I have advised against holding hearings in our committee on this project, urging that we postpone action until this Commission has had its opportunity to review the matter.

We have the water and we have the land, as you have seen, to put it on. It is our intention to use Montana water to the greatest possible extent to develop an irrigation economy in our State. We have been doing so with considerable success in other sections of the State, and we are not going to overlook the upper Marias region.

However, we realize that this water has been flowing without interruption into Canada and that the people of Canada, with whom we in Montana have the most cordial and friendly relations, may have been making some use of small amounts of this water which they could not easily replace from Canadian sources. We also realize that if it were not for the international boundary a few miles north of here, we could and would have worked out a plan long ago for the beneficial use of this water, including its use on land in Montana. We feel that any Canadian interest should be given consideration in our plans.

We feel that the best interests of the people of this region, on both sides of the border, will be served to the greatest advantage and with the least expenditure of funds if we can work together to utilize the water we have between us. We feel that such arrangements can be made without any infringement of the sovereignty of either nation. That is why we asked our Government to seek a reference to the International Joint Commission.

We look forward to your study of methods of mutual advantage for the beneficial use of the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers. I am confident that advantageous plans can be made to put this water to work for all of us.

We hope real progress will be made as a result of these hearings. We are happy to have you here among us so that you may learn our problems and see for yourselves that we need and can use this water.

LETTER OF HON. ZALES N. ECTON, SENATOR FROM MONTANA

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1950.

Hon. A. O. STANLEY,
Chairman, International Joint Commission, United States Section, Washington, D. C.

SIR: It is with sincere regret that I find it impossible, on account of pressing legislation before the Congress, to be in attendance at the hearings which your Commission has arranged to hold at Shelby, Mont., on June 12, and at Havre, Mont., on June 17, 1950, or to be present and participate in the field inspection of the area involved.

However I have asked the Honorable J. Hugo Aronson of Cut Bank, Mont., to be present, if it is possible for him to do so, and have authorized him to make such statements on my behalf as he feels the problem warrants. Mr. Aronson has for many years represented his county in our State Legislature and is personally familiar with the irrigation needs and possibilities of the area involved.

He, I am sure, will point out to the members of your honorable Commission that Montana feels it has a just and prior claim to such portions of the waters of the Waterton-Belly Rivers as arise within its borders, and that its needs are valid and real if that great section of our State is to accomplish urgently needed development.

The consideration and courtesy of the members of your honorable Commission in affording the people of my State the opportunity of presenting facts and pertinent information regarding this matter, which is of such great importance in the future development of Montana, is sincerely appreciated. I hope your stay there will be not only pleasant but will result in an even better understanding between the two friendly nations which have so much in common.

Cordially yours.

ZALES N. ECTON,
United States Senator from Montana.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JAMES E. MURRAY REGARDING WATERTON-BELLY RIVERS REFERENCE

The subject matter of field hearings of the International Joint Commission, namely the division of waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers on an equitable and beneficial use basis between the people of Canada and the United States, is vitally important to the continued growth and development of our respective economies. This matter is of particular importance to the people of my State of Montana who reside in Toole, Liberty, and Hill Counties.

Because of my legislative duties, I am unable to appear in person before the International Joint Commission and I am, therefore, taking this means to urge upon the members of the Commission the vital necessity of arriving at a sound and equitable solution of this problem.

Basic to such a solution is complete recognition of Montana's equitable rights in and to those waters which originate within the boundaries of the State. This is particularly true when, as in Montana, it can be demonstrated that there is a definite need for such water and that it can be put to useful and productive purposes.

The north central Montana area, within the boundaries of the above-mentioned counties, is composed of dry and irrigable land which historically has been subject to recurrent droughts and crop failures. The people of the region are dependent for their livelihood upon a one-crop economy. There is a desperate need for diversification of crops through increased irrigation and reclamation in this area so that the people may become no longer completely dependent upon a one-crop economy. Diversification through the proper use of waters arising in Montana on these irrigable lands will bring about a stabilized economy instead of successive droughts, crop failures, land losses, and general economic depression.

It is an established policy of the United States to expend large amounts of public funds for the reclamation of submarginal and dry-land areas through the construction of irrigation and reclamation projects. The continually expanding development of the land and water resources of the West is a policy to which this Government is completely committed and which will continue to be carried forward by congressional authorizations and appropriations. These irrigation and reclamation projects are rightly regarded as being of benefit not only to the people of the particular State wherein they are established but to the people of the United States generally in that through the reclamation of dry and unproductive lands benefits in the guise of an expanding and prosperous economy, new sources of taxable wealth and an increasing consumption of goods and services are made possible for the benefit of all the people of this country.

I have been advised that the Waterton and Belly Rivers water flow is sufficient to provide water for some 139,000 acres of land in the three north-central Montana counties to which I referred above. This large land area should and must be put to productive use through the beneficial use of these waters. The Colorado-Big Thompson project in western Colorado is an example of what can be done to divert water from its source and bring it, by means of tunnels, on to dry and irrigable lands at some distance from the point of diversion. It is my further understanding that the United States Bureau of Reclamation has given careful study to the possibility of constructing a 20-mile tunnel to take water from the Waterton River into the north central Montana counties and that such a plan is considered feasible. However, I am sure that such an undertaking will not be at all necessary if all the members of the International Joint Commission continue to explore the many alternatives which are present and by which the waters of the Belly and Waterton Rivers may be divided for the mutual advantage of both the people of Canada and the United States.

The traditional and historic friendship and economic interdependence of the people of Canada and the United States are firm bases upon which the Commission may proceed to an amicable and mutually satisfactory settlement of this important international problem.

I therefore make this urgent appeal to the members of the International Joint Commission to apply their best efforts toward finding a just and equitable solution.

May I extend my personal best wishes to the members of the Commission for a pleasant and agreeable visit to the State of Montana? I am sure you will enjoy Montana's traditional friendliness and hospitality.

JAMES E. MURRAY,
United States Senator from Montana.
MAY 31, 1950.

LETTER OF HON. MIKE MANSFIELD, FIRST DISTRICT, MONTANA

MAY 19, 1950.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: Due to the fact that Congress is in session, it will not be possible for me to attend the public hearings to be held by the International Joint Commission in the State of Montana, and the Province of Alberta, Canada, during the month of June concerning the Waterton and Belly Rivers which rise in our State and flow into Canada.

I was indeed pleased to note that these public hearings will be held, and I wish to state that I will support the Governor of Montana, the Attorney General of Montana, and the people of Montana in this project.

The people of Montana have a deep interest in the development of these two streams for the establishment of an irrigation economy. They are looking forward to the study by your Commission of means by which this water can be put to beneficial use on the lands in Montana. As you know, it is the policy of the State of Montana to use Montana water on Montana lands. It was with this purpose in mind that the matter was referred to your Commission in order that consideration might be given to whatever riparian or other interests our good neighbors in Canada might have in these streams that could not be satisfied from waters of Canadian origin.

I understand that considerable progress has been made so far by your Commission in studying the present and future uses of all of the waters of this reference, including those which arise in Montana. I am hopeful that engineering plans for the maximum use of all of these waters may be considered in order that the maximum possible apportionment be made to Montana. This is needed so as to assure that the irrigation and power development project which will utilize this water will be of maximum feasibility, as we cannot construct costly tunnels to utilize only a small quantity of water—but we can do so for the use of an appreciable part of this water.

We will patiently await the outcome of your deliberations and it is my hope that a solution satisfactory to the people on both sides of the international boundary can be reached.

Must close now but I do want to thank the Commission for the opportunity of presenting my views on this matter. With best wishes, I am

Sincerely yours,

MIKE MANSFIELD,
Member of Congress.

IT IS HAPPENING HERE

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES. Mr. Speaker, it is happening here. Thousands of babies and invalid men and women in the District of Columbia are unable to have milk this morning unless they have doctors' prescriptions. They cannot have it unless a doctor says they absolutely need it. Little children more than 2 years old and other people must go without the most important of all foods. And to make matters worse, this situation has come about without warning or notice of any kind. While this is going on, thousands of gallons of milk are being poured into the gutters. At the same time mothers are lining up in grocery stores and other places in a frantic effort to get milk to feed their children.

All this is happening in a representative government. It is happening in the shadows of the dome of the Capitol of that Government. Rather odd, is it not, that American people are providing food for people in other parts of the world while here in the United States there is a food supply, including milk, but people in certain areas cannot have it.

To make matters worse, importation of milk produced outside of a limited distance from Washington is not permitted. A comparatively small group of producers and dealers have control of the supply of milk for approximately a million people in the Capitol City. Can there be any reason why producers outside the controlled area should not have a chance at this market, provided, of course, they comply with rules and regulations with regard to purity and other food standards?

Mr. Speaker, the situation to which I have called attention is a strange one in free America. Here are thousands of people in need of the most important of all foods. A supply is available, but they cannot get it. Irrespective of who may be responsible, this is a matter that ought to be resolved immediately. It should not be condoned.

SUDETEN GERMANS

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a memorandum written by Mr. Hans Wagner and addressed to the Government and Congress of the United States. It is a pathetic document but, Mr. Speaker, we will ignore it and others like it at our peril. It recites the tragedy of some of the expellees of the Sudetenland. They are some of the 13,000,000 German expellees wandering hopeless and homeless over Europe at this moment. They are young, between the ages of 15 and 25.

It has been well said that in the old sorrow is sorrow, but in the young it is despair. These young people are in despair and therefore desperate. They may well be the spark that will ignite the torch that will turn this cold war into a hot war.

Mr. Speaker, we must find a solution for this problem and we must find it now.

Here is Mr. Wagner's memorandum:

Memorandum: To the Government and to the Congress of the United States.

In re: The question of the Sudeten expellees.

Submitted by: Former Member of Parliament in Prague, Hans Wagner, of Vienna, June 1, 1950.

In the capacity of former Sudeten German Deputy to the Czech Parliament in Prague; present chairman of the Charitable Union of All Expellees in Austria and former head of Willfried for Austria (resistance movement which I myself founded to combat the Hitler regime), I have come to the United States for one purpose: I hope to bring before the President of the United States and the Members of the Congress a plea from the Sudeten Germans for help in regaining their lost homeland.

The Sudeten Germans are the original inhabitants of their country, having come from Bavarian, Austrian, Saxon, Frankish, and Silesian stock and settled in the Sudetenland long before the Czech people entered that part of Europe as serfs of the Avars from the East.

It was not until the Austro-Hungarian monarchy was destroyed in 1919 after World War I (by Czech instigation), that the Czech people first achieved independent statehood. At that time, in utter disregard of the principle of self-determination the Sudeten area, 100 percent German, with 3,101,423 people, was given to the newly formed Czech state. (The Czechs themselves only numbered 6,500,000.) In 1938, under the Munich Agreement, in belated recognition of the right of self-determination, the Sudeten Germans were freed from Czech control and the land was joined to Austria and Germany. However, in total disregard of the Munich Agreement, the Czech Government in Exile influenced the Yalta and Potsdam conferees in such a way that a new decision was made, namely, the resettlement, at the hands of the small Slavic neighboring countries, of all German ethnic groups.

For the Czechs this meant the power to decimate, martyr, rob, and pillage all Germans, and it ended with the brutal expulsion of the Germans from their ancestral homes.

Three million surviving Sudeten Germans cannot ever accept this act of terror. While they do not approve of war as a solution, they do want a clear-cut western declaration of all-out moral support for the restoration of their homes. They are deeply concerned lest the Czechs, spurred on by their success in two wars, will, through the intrigue of a government in exile, win the consent of America to legalize the theft of their homelands.

The Communists are using our present plight to lure us with bait so tempting that there is only one assurance that promises to save the situation: the hope that America will reaffirm the principle of self-determination and stand by us in our claim on our homelands and property, and that she will, at the opportune time, not deny us her help in winning them back. I can assure you, that if I can go back to my people with this promise, not only will millions of expellees, but 70,000,000 Germans and Austrians, will stand firm as a barrier between the Western World and the terror that rages in the East.

HANS WAGNER.

GOVERNMENT HOARDING OF FOOD

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a tabulation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I reported on Tuesday an analysis of the Report of Financial Condition and Operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation as of April 30, 1950, which is now available. I pointed out that from June 30, 1949, through April 30, 1950, the Federal Government had increased its holdings of dried milk from 83,410,414 pounds to 315,913,638 pounds.

Today I wish to report on an analysis of Federal holdings of butter and dried eggs.

On June 30, 1949, the Federal Government had in storage 6,386,177 pounds of butter. From that date through April 30, 1950, it purchased 120,894,292 pounds. It managed to dispose of only 182,181 pounds under section 416 of Public Law 439 and had on hand on April 30, 1950, 98,695,046 pounds. It cost the Government during this period $1,474,284.30 for carrying charges on this item alone. I am also advised that as of April 30 there were contracts to purchase an additional 11,469,447 pounds. The net increase is 1725 percent.

On June 30, 1949, the Federal Government had in storage 63,183,456 pounds of dried eggs. From that date through April 30, 1950, it purchased 41,120,014 pounds. It managed to dispose of only 2,492,904 pounds under section 416 of Public Law 439 and had on hand on April 30, 1950, 88,444,915 pounds. It cost the Government during this period $1,885,889.13 for carrying charges on this item alone. I am also advised that as of April 30 there were contracts to purchase an additional 11,282,877 pounds. The net increase is 157 percent.

So we find that with 2 months remaining in this fiscal year, the Federal Government had run up its hoarding of butter, dried milk, and dried eggs from 152,980,047 pounds to 503,053,599 pounds. It had paid out $6,358,729.28 just to keep this more than 500,000,000 pounds of food in storage. That amount of money would have paid the transportation charges on many millions of pounds of these wholesome food commodities to people who cannot afford to buy them. It is nothing short of an outrageous scandal that every effort to assure that these wholesome foods are eaten, rather than to permit them to spoil or be destroyed, has met with stubborn resistance.

I also wish to make available a report furnished to me by the Production and Marketing Administration, showing the distribution of orders for butter, cheese, dried eggs, dry milk, and Irish potatoes under section 416 of Public Law 479 and Irish potatoes under section 3, Public Law 471 as of May 31, 1950. I might refer to the report I received covering the same commodities as of May 17, which I placed in the RECORD on May 19 at page 7358. It is obvious that the program has slowed down during this period between May 17 and May 31. In this connection I wish to include a paragraph from a letter I have received from K. T. Hutchinson, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, as follows:

In a letter to you, dated May 11, from Mr. John I. Thompson, Assistant Administrator, Production and Marketing Administration, it was explained that under provisions of section 416 surplus commodities are made available to States that request them and in amounts sufficient to take care of the States' nonprofit school lunch programs, charitable institutions and welfare cases. The varying amounts among the States, as set forth in the tabulation furnished you, reflects the amounts ordered by the State agency or agencies and does not reflect an allocation by the Federal Government. A number of States have established distribution systems, complete with warehouses, transportation facilities and personnel and, therefore, are in a position to order and distribute surplus commodities to a fuller extent of their needs. Further, it is evident that some States have adequate funds to pay freight on the commodities from point of storage to central points within the States as is required under section 416, whereas other States do not have sufficient funds to pay such freight charges or are unwilling to spend their available funds for such purpose.

It is particularly significant, I submit, that Mr. Hutchinson has reached the conclusion that some of our States either do not have sufficient funds to pay the freight charges or are unwilling to spend their available funds for this purpose. I have repeatedly stated that the current program is inequitable in the extreme and that the Federal Government is under an obligation to be fair to all of its citizens. This should be ample evidence for this Congress to take immediate and constructive action. The Executive Department has had every opportunity to correct the situation under existing law.

The conditions which now exist are fantastic and incredible and call for immediate action.

The tabulation is as follows:

SURPLUS POTATOES

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, American housewives who are paying 5 and 6 cents a pound for potatoes at their markets today must be shocked, certainly perplexed, when they read in their newspapers that at the same time potatoes are being purchased for resale to the Russians in eastern Germany for 1 cent a pound.

Yet this is exactly what is happening. One hundred million pounds of potatoes, which were declared surplus under the price-support program, have been sold to New York exporters at 1 cent a pound for resale at a profit to the Reds when not only our housewives but the Army, veterans' hospitals, and other Government agencies are paying current market prices for potatoes of the same quality.

This fantastic situation is but one more deplorable result of the Administration's fumbling attempts to solve a domestic problem. Under the potato price-support program—which, incidentally, has been pursued at a cost of $500,000,000 to the American taxpayers—potato growers in Canada have found it profitable to export potatoes for sale in the open market in this country while our own potatoes were being declared surplus and many actually destroyed. Under this program, too, you will recall, a potato grower could sell potatoes to the Government for $1.46 per 100 pounds and then buy them back for livestock feed at 1 cent per 100 pounds, the potatoes in many cases never leaving the farm.

In my judgment there can be no justification for a program which permits the sale of potatoes at 1 cent a pound to exporters for sale to the Russians while our own housewives and tax-supported institutions are paying 5 and 6 cents a pound for the same product.

THIRTEEN MONTHS AND STILL NO BED FOR DISABLED VETERAN

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Speaker, if anybody still doubts the need for additional hospital beds for veterans, I want to mention one of the tragic incidents that I personally know. It is a case of a veteran, who saw plenty of active foreign service, and as a result of which his mind was at least temporarily affected. Unfortunately, this is not at all an unusual circumstance. There is no question in my mind but what the mental affliction was directly service-connected, but it was not clearly established.

The father of this boy is a personal friend of mine, and occupies a position of distinction in my district, but does not have substantial financial means. He caused the boy to be hospitalized at his own expense and bore the expense until he was entirely out of money. He then sought help from the Veterans' Administration approximately 13 months ago. In the meantime he continued to do everything he possibly could within his limited means to take care of his son.

The formal application for hospital treatment was made in March 1949. In April 1950 this father, who in the meantime has nearly impoverished himself, received a printed card on which it said:

We regret that a bed has not yet become available for you.

This father and son have made great sacrifices for this country. They are entitled to some sacrifice being made for them. Most certainly, Mr. Speaker, they are entitled to something better than a printed post card 13 months after their cry for help.

This is part of the accumulated evidence for the need of the 16,000-bed hospital program which the House has now twice authorized and the President has once canceled. I hope the President will not cancel it again and once more thwart the will of Congress.

It is an argument, too, against closing Valley Forge and other Army hospitals when it is quite evident they are needed by the Veterans' Administration. The President still opposes using Valley Forge.

Mr. Speaker, we should be guided by the words of Abraham Lincoln, who enjoined his countrymen to bind up the Nation's wounds and to care for those who have borne the brunt of the battle. That advice, given to the Nation almost 100 years ago, is still good enough for me.

DOCUMENTS PRINTED BY GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, in these days when the Government is running behind to the tune of $450,000,000 a month, it is interesting to know that there are places where we can save money.

I have before me a document issued by the Superintendent of Documents of the Government Printing Office on how to change your spare time into hobby time. Just think of it. There are 30 different pamphlets that the Government Printing Office has paid a lot of ne'er-do-wells to get up, on the question as to how you can develop hobbies. That is a wonderful thing to take money out of the Treasury and to use it at a time when we do not have it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday on the vote on the rent-control bill my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] asked to be paired against the bill. The RECORD fails to disclose that. I wish to state that had the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REGAN] been present, he would have voted to recommit the bill and would have voted against the bill on final passage.

VETERANS' HOSPITAL AT LONG BEACH, CALIF.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago one of my distinguished colleagues from my native State of California mentioned the veterans' hospital at Long Beach and Van Nuys, Calif. Because I represent the district in which the great new veterans' hospital is located at Long Beach, Calif., it having succeeded to the Long Beach Navy Hospital properties, I wish to say it seems to me that the matter of administration of a veterans' hospital is a matter of internal administration and not of legislation by Congress.

On yesterday I learned from Maj. Omar W. Clark, Deputy Administrator of the Veterans' Administration here at Washington, that the Veterans' Administration had, during the first week of June 1950, established an out-patient clinical facility for the paraplegics from Van Nuys, Calif., and from the San Fernando Valley, and so the solution of the very problem that the gentleman from the West Los Angeles or Santa Monica and Sawtelle area mentioned has already been reasonably and promptly attacked and satisfactory solution initiated.

Major Clark yesterday also advised me that he had just been informed from the Sawtelle Veterans' Hospital, located in the gentleman's congressional district, that several of the paraplegics from the San Fernando Valley had already been cared for with the out-patient facilities which were installed early in June to take care of this very problem.

He and I are certainly in accord that there must be the maximum and most prompt care furnished to these distinguished veterans who find themselves termed as "paraplegics" on account of the permanency and extent of the physical tragedy which has hit them in connection with their unselfish service to our Nation. I would be the last person in the world to want any limitation of service less than everything that is possible to be done for them by our great Nation.

But, since it has been noted here in the Nation's Capital that a Los Angeles newspaper did, on June 9, 1950, reportedly quote the distinguished gentleman from California as having personally inspected the paraplegic wards at the Long Beach Veterans' Hospital the day before and was "horrified at what he saw yesterday in the paraplegic wards at the Long Beach Veterans' Hospital," I personally inspected the hospital the following day again and personally interviewed Mr. Tom Fowler, assistant manager, relative to the newspaper's reported criticisms by Representative DON JACKSON, my distinguished colleague from the Santa Monica or Sawtelle Veterans' Hospital area. I took one of my shorthand-writing secretaries along, and my interview with him on June 10, 1950, concerning the seven points of criticism about which the Los Angeles newspaper said Representative DON JACKSON was horrified was as follows—I will say, however, that my distinguished colleague, on yesterday, told me that the word "horrified" was an exaggerated term and that he was not horrified:

Representative DOYLE. (1) That there are 48 beds to a ward at the Long Beach Hospital where Birmingham had 32?

Mr. FOWLER. That is correct. We have 48 beds to a ward here in Long Beach, because the Long Beach wards have more floor space per ward than the Birmingham wards. Long Beach has 100 square feet per bed whereas Birmingham had 70 square feet per bed. The Long Beach beds are not crowded a bit. The Long Beach wards are much better to work in than the Birmingham wards because of the construction.

Representative DOYLE. (2) How about the wheel-chair paraplegics being compelled to go a long distance to the mess hall?

Mr. FOWLER. Those patients who can propel their chairs go to the mess hall, and those who cannot are served in bed. Those who went to the mess hall in Birmingham had a good distance to go. Doctors feel it is good for them to go to the mess hall if they can possibly do so, for it is good for them to have that exercise. The distance to the mess hall at Long Beach is one-third further than at Birmingham.

Representative DOYLE. (3) How about the kitchens so far from the wards that the food is cold by the time it is brought to bedfast patients?

Mr. FOWLER. There is a kitchen unit for each ward. Electrically heated food conveyors are plugged in at the ward, and if the food gets cold in these conveyors en route to the ward, when it is plugged in at the ward, it is hot before it is served. The conveyors are plugged in immediately they reach the ward and the food is served direct from the ward unit. We do not serve patients cold food, Congressman, you can depend upon that.

Representative DOYLE. (4) How about the sloping ground around the ward so that patients, when they go outdoors, have to be pushed up grades instead of being able to wheel themselves?

Mr. FOWLER. The ramp arrangement and the streets are a little different than Birmingham where the streets are practically level. If a man parks his chair he must be pushed back up the hill. We would like to have ramps which will run alongside the buildings and have no incline.

Representative DOYLE. Does the present ramp work a hardship?

Mr. FOWLER. No, sir. I see many of the men push their wheels up the ramp without any trouble.

Representative DOYLE. Is that situation similar in coming to and from the mess hall?

Mr. FOWLER. There is an incline, but the men have not complained. Doctors say it is good for the patients physically, while it might be harder work, yet the exercise is good for them. Not one of the patients have complained to Dr. Edwards directly or indirectly, and I have talked with many of them, and the Chief of the Medical Service has said nothing about its being a hardship or danger to the health of the men who ride in wheelchairs. The Chief of the Health Service approved the design and construction of the ramps to be constructed. The money is on hand and the building has been authorized. It is proposed to build concrete ramps for safety in case of fire. The ramps now are of wood construction.

Representative DOYLE. (5) Are there only two attendants on duty at night in each ward, so that, in case of fire, the work of removing helpless men would be seriously hampered?

Mr. FOWLER. There are two attendants in each ward from 9 p. m. to 7 a. m., unless other attendants are required—the patients sleep all night, and we do have less attendants than during the day. A doctor is on call through the night on each ward. I would say that the personnel is sufficient to comply with our medical needs. We maintain stand-by personnel in case of fire. And, in case of fire we would have personnel available in short order. We have a fire-fighting plan in effect that require attendants trained to evacuate patients quickly. At Birmingham we evacuated the entire patients from a ward in 1 minute.

Representative DOYLE. Could you do that in Long Beach with 48 patients in a ward?

Mr. FOWLER. Having 48 patients in a ward instead of 32 I would say that we could evacuate patients in little more than a minute in case of fire.

Representative DOYLE. How about the terrific hardship for paraplegics who have homes in the Van Nuys area and must drive 57 miles for treatment if they want to consult the doctors familiar with their cases?

Mr. FOWLER. It is my understanding that they can get out-patient treatment wherever they may apply. If a patient applies for treatment in West Los Angeles he would be provided treatment and it would not be necessary for him to come to Long Beach, but of course, if they want to consult the doctor who cared for them at Long Beach, they would have to come to Long Beach. But they can apply to any Veterans' Administration hospital and get treatment. West Los Angeles facility is only 14 miles from Van Nuys, or about a 20-minute drive. The health of the patient is not endangered by coming 57 miles to Long Beach. Should a man be taken acutely ill we will send an ambulance and an attendant to bring him to the hospital, plus paying an attendant to take care of him.

Representative DOYLE. The newspaper cited a paraplegic out-patient who, during the night, developed a serious obstruction and a fever of 104 degrees. Unable to reach his own doctor, who had been transferred to Long Beach, the man was forced to wait until the next day to be driven down for treatment.

Mr. FOWLER. That is liable to happen. It happens every day. Many people in civil life unable to reach their own doctor must of necessity wait until morning to be taken care of. It is just one of those things.

Representative DOYLE. How about the tubs and toilets?

Mr. FOWLER. We have 11 bathtubs and several toilets. We did not have as many tubs at Birmingham. The physical therapy unit is more convenient at Long Beach and more accessible than at Birmingham.

Representative DOYLE. How about the recreation room?

Mr. FOWLER. It is not as good as at Birmingham, but we are working on it and in time it will be the best. It is more available and we have four motion-picture shows a week. Wheel chair patients and bed patients enjoy the recreation room.

About the therapeutic pool: At Birmingham we had two brine baths—here we have installed two Hubbard tubs which are used for physical therapy treatments. We plan to put in a pool, and this will make all facilities here equal to or better than Birmingham. The Hubbard tub is adequate until the pool is completed. The tub is limited to just so many patients a day. The tub must be drained, which takes time; the capacity per day would be about 8 to 12 patients per hour.

The Government is better situated to provide service down to San Diego, while in the Birmingham area there were three hospitals in an area of 14 miles with 9,000 beds, an unfair distribution; San Fernando, Birmingham, and Sawtelle. There had been talk of putting beds in people's homes to take care of patients here and San Diego. This way, this Long Beach hospital can save money for the taxpayers.

About 20 patients are the only ones affected by this move against thousands who will benefit by it.

We have had no complaints from any of the patients. No complaints from relatives, friends, or parents where the hospital is concerned or the treatment accorded the patients. Dr. Edwards is most conscientious.

Mr. Speaker, I now further advise you that several days ago I began the study of and I expect to immediately file a bill in this Congress, the substantial terms and provisions and objectives of which will be to ask prevention against loss to the paraplegics who had to be permanently moved and transferred to the Long Beach Veterans Hospital from the San Fernando area and who had previously bought homes under the GI bill and who, on account of the necessity of moving to Long Beach to obtain necessary permanent hospitalization, have or will have to sell their specially built and constructed and equipped paraplegic homes at a loss in order to purchase similar homes at Long Beach.

In other words, my bill will ask that, in such cases, the Congress enact emergency legislation so that these fewer than 100 distinguished veterans shall not be compelled to shoulder a financial loss, if they have one, in the necessary disposition of their present homes to avail themselves of the Long Beach Veterans Hospital facilities promptly and as easily as possible.

I herewith ask unanimous approval of the objectives of such bill and ask unanimous and immediate cooperation of every Member of Congress in its worthy objectives.

THE BRANNAN PLAN

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to commend the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON]. Last winter, during the session of Congress, we had considerable talk about what we ought to do in connection with perishable commodities. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON] has apparently listened to the suggestions of the Secretary of Agriculture, and even though it must be difficult for him, because of Republican Party policy, has given some very good reasons for supporting the Brannan plan.

The disposal of nonstorable farm commodities is a real farm-program problem. I am glad to see an awakening as to this problem by some of the Members who have hindered action by the Congress in solving this legislative problem.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARSHALL. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is most regrettable procedure, in my opinion, for men to take the floor and make an attacking speech when the Congress itself is to blame, trying to give the impression that the executive branch of the Government is to blame when we are to blame for the situation that exists. The Congress did that, and not the executive branch. Listening to Members make such speeches is to me distasteful.

Mr. MARSHALL. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts. However, I do commend the gentleman from Ohio for seeing the problem. I trust he will assist in solving it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HART). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

WHAT IS THE CIVIL AERONAUTICS ADMINISTRATION?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, only a small percentage of our 150,000,000 citizens are aware of the services they are receiving for their tax dollars from the Civil Aeronautics Administration. They hear occasionally about VHF, ILS, GCA, and all the other terms which are so important in the CAA appropriation, but these are just so much alphabetese to the average American.

Through my duties as a member of the Appropriations Committee, I have had the opportunity of studying the services which the CAA performs for the American public, and I think it would be worth while to take a few minutes to examine the interesting and valuable operations of this agency. Although it accounts for less than one-half of 1 percent of the total Federal budget, CAA does a job which is important to every citizen.

One of the most far-reaching CAA services is the establishment, operation, and maintenance of the Federal airways. These highways of the sky are as indispensable to our air commerce and air defense as roads on the ground are to the movement of motor vehicles.

Exactly what is a Federal airway? No one can see it, but to a pilot it is reassuringly real. A Federal airway is a path through the sky, 10 miles wide, formed by the transmissions of a radio range. Radio markers tell the pilot his progress along these paths. Communications stations give him weather and traffic information. Airport traffic control towers clear him for landings and take-offs, and air route traffic control centers give him clearances that will keep him separated from other traffic if he is flying by instruments through or above the clouds.

CAA operates approximately 60,000 miles of such airways in the United States. Along these airways it maintains 421 communications stations, 337 low-frequency radio ranges, 159 control towers, and 27 air route control centers.

These basic facilities are the product of more than 20 years of cooperative development work by CAA, the aviation industry, radio manufacturers, the Bureau of Standards, and the Armed Forces. They have been essential factors in the growth of American aviation, from the days when bonfires lighted the way for the night mail, to the present, when CAA control towers handle the amazing total of more than 16,900,000 take-offs and landings a year.

But just as we find it necessary to progress from gravel roads to four-lane divided highways, so in aviation must we improve our skylanes, to permit safe and regular movement of an ever-growing volume of traffic.

Yesterday's devices and methods for air navigation and traiffic control will not be good enough for the planes we know will traverse our skies tomorrow.

With money the Congress has appropriated in past years, the CAA has made a start toward bringing our airways system in line with the needs of the flying fifties. The four courses transmitted by the radio range which has been standard up to now are not enough in an age when people want to fly from anywhere to anywhere. Consequently, CAA is introducing an omnidirectional range. The omni's, as they are called, emit their signals around the full 360 degrees of the compass. Thus, when enough omni's are installed, their signals will virtually blanket the United States, providing comprehensive directional guidance.

Coupled with this improvement is the conversion of the radio ranges and associated communications facilities to very high frequencies, or VHF. The present low and medium frequencies are too subject to static and interference to permit the instantaneous understanding required as the speed of aircraft increases. VHF voice transmissions, however, will be clear cut. The directional feature of the ranges will be moved entirely out of the aural realm, into the visual. Instead of listening closely for the monotonous dit-dah or dah-dit which marks the quadrants of the present range courses, the pilot will simply fly left or right as required to keep a needle centered on a dial. When that needle is centered, the pilot will know he is on course to or from the desired omnirange.

CAA has installed 302 of these omniranges and eventually will operate 400.

A companion piece of equipment for the omniranges will be distance-measuring equipment—DME. Instead of knowing his exact position along range courses only when he passes over radio markers, through DME the pilot at all times will have a reading of his distance from the range. A transmitter in the plane will "trigger" the DME transmitter at the range station, and the time taken for the signals to travel will be automatically translated into distance from the station.

Equally important with the reliable en route guidance provided by the omniranges is assurance of a safe landing in bad weather. For this purpose, CAA has the instrument-landing system, which operates on radio principles, and the ground-controlled approach method, which utilizes radar and radio. The instrument-landing system offers a safe pathway for descent to the airport down two radio beams, one known as the localizer, extending outward from the center line of the runway; the other, known as the glide path, intersecting the localizer at the point where the pilot should begin his descent. These radio beams actuate cross-pointer needles on a dial in the cockpit. The pilot makes a landing on the ILS by flying toward the needles, right or left, up or down, as required to keep both needles centered. The vertical needle of this instrument, incidentally, is the same one used in flying the omnirange course en route to the airport.

The GCA, or precision approach radar, to give it the correct technical name, involves the use of radar to track the plane, with a ground controller radioing the pilot the necessary instructions for keeping the plane on the correct landing path. GCA may be used independently to guide any radio-equipped plane to a landing, or it may be used as a double check to monitor a plane landing by means of the ILS.

CAA now operates 92 instrument-landing systems, and eventually plans to have in service a total of 181. It has 4 GCA sets in regular operation, with more than 50 ultimately due to be installed. These two aids are making possible substantial improvement in regularity of service for the traveling public.

Still another important aid to safety and efficiency on the airways is surveillance radar. Devices of this kind will give the controller in the airport tower a radar picture of all air traffic movements in the area despite bad weather. As we strive to bring down the interval between landings it becomes even more important that we have close control of approaching traffic, so that planes can be fed into the landing pattern with precision. The more than 70 surveillance radars eventually to be installed will aid in achieving this machinelike regularity.

I could go on at considerable length about other remarkable improvements which are on the way—course-line computers, mechanical interlocks, high-intensity lights, and so on. What they all add up to is the greater regularity of service so essential to the growth of our air commerce, and the capacity to move large numbers of planes swiftly and surely to any points where they would be needed in a national emergency.

One of the most gratifying features of this whole airways improvement program is the unity of civil and military interests in its planning and execution. CAA, Air Force, Army, and Navy members sit together on the Air Navigation Development Board to coordinate the research and development work necessary to keep the United States airways system the most advanced in the world. CAA airways facilities also form a vital link in the air defense chain being forged around our borders by the National Military Establishment by supplying information on the flight plans of friendly planes to the units charged with interception of potential attackers.

While the Federal airways offer these many aids to safe flying, the CAA also carries on a continuous program to assure that aircraft themselves are airworthy, and that they are flown by competent pilots in a safe manner.

When the industry was young and the number of aircraft and pilots was small CAA employees personally performed the necessary examinations. Today, with more than 500,000 pilots and close to 100,000 aircrafts, CAA agents for the most part play an educational and supervisory role, guiding thousands of carefully selected industry representatives in the administration of inspection.

These inspections begin with an engineering analysis of proposed aircraft designs, followed by ground and flight tests of a prototype, and a check on facilities for manufacturing in quantity. CAA protection of the flying public does not end when the plane leaves the factory. Periodic inspections are required to make sure that the plane is maintained in airworthy condition.

CAA also watches over all the operating practices of airlines and nonscheduled carriers. Before an airline opens a new route, for example, CAA agents go along on proving runs, to make sure that airport and airway facilities are adequate, that the pilots are fully familiar with the route, and that all other safety precautions are observed. This is one means whereby it guards the safety of 15,000,000 airline passengers a year.

CAA is the licensing agency not only for pilots, but for mechanics, flight instructors, parachute riggers, and other specialized aviation personnel. It issues certificates to these airmen on the basis of demonstrated practical skill, aeronautical knowledge and physical condition, using tests geared to encourage participation in aviation by all who can do so without endangering others.

Another CAA activity which makes an important contribution to the progress of American aviation is the Federal airport program. Many of us are aware of this program in terms of individual projects in our communities, but few realize the extent to which it is remaking our national airport system.

As of May 1, CAA had programed work at 1,153 airports, involving Federal funds of $141,186,000 and a slightly larger amount from the communities aided. A total of 694 construction or improvement projects have been completed to date.

These projects benefit all types of communities and all phases of aviation. They include giant air terminals serving the great metropolises; medium-sized airports which enable smaller cities to receive feeder line air service; and small airports as bases for private flying, training schools, dusters, sprayers, and other operations.

We can all feel confident that the $157,000,000 appropriated thus far for the Federal airport program is being expended wisely. Each year the CAA revises its national airport plan, and according to the appropriations granted by Congress, programs those locations in the plan for which there is the greatest aeronautical necessity. When a State does not use the funds allocated to it on the basis of its area and population, these funds are redistributed.

In order to aid the greatest number of communities possible with the smallest expenditure, CAA is emphasizing single-strip airports, made possible by its development of the cross-wind landing gear.

Other steps CAA is taking to get more value out of every airport dollar include promotion of express highways to the airports, and studies of the space and design requirements of terminal buildings.

CAA conducts a many-sided program of aviation development. One aspect especially interesting to those of us who come from agricultural areas is the cooperative effort of CAA and the Department of Agriculture to develop a plane especially designed for dusting and spraying. Work is well under way on this project at Texas A. & M. College, and when the prototype is perfected, all the data will be turned over to manufacturers. Every year the airplane plays a greater part in protecting our crops and forests from insect pests, and I feel we can expect rich returns from the $50,000 CAA has invested in this development.

Helping the schools of our Nation teach aeronautics and the significance of the airplane in modern society to millions of young Americans is another CAA developmental activity with tremendous long-range values. We will need an air-minded generation if the United States is to hold its own, commercially and militarily, in the age of jets.

The information materials published by CAA also do much to spread aviation knowledge among both flyers and nonflyers. Publications such as Terrain Flying and the Airman's Guide are literally lifesavers for pilots.

If I attempted to cover all the worthwhile services performed by CAA, I could go on almost indefinitely. There is the Technical Development Center at Indianapolis, which has made many significant contributions in the past, such as the birdproof windshield, and is working on such important items as crash-resistant fuel tanks; the International Region, with 10 foreign offices from which CAA agents inspect the operations of American-flag carriers and disseminate American aviation know-how to friendly foreign governments; and the Washington National Airport, which is a model of efficient and virtually self-supporting operation.

All in all, we have in the Civil Aeronautics Administration a Government agency which more than justifies its existence in terms of service rendered to the American people.

SLOW MAIL SERVICE

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has just told us about a Government series of pamphlets on how to loaf constructively. Doubtless the authors had in mind how to occupy one's time while waiting for the receipt of a letter sent a week or so ago by the slow or mule-train service which now exists under Mr. Truman's happy-go-lucky administration.

The distinguished majority leader has said that we should blame the Congress for some things that we blame on the President. If that be the case, then the Congress—and by that I mean the leadership on the majority side which has a plurality of 90 votes in one body and 12 in the other—is to blame as much as the President for the slow mail service, and they ought to do something about it. Vice President Marshall once said: "What this country needs is a good 5-cent cigar." I would suggest that what the country needs today is better mail service and more serviceable males in Government.

THE POTATO SUBSIDY

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the distinguished majority leader for just a moment, in 1947 the potato growers of California came to Washington and asked that the support price of potatoes be reduced from 90 percent which the Department was paying to approximately 60 or 65 percent, but the Secretary refused the request. Is that the fault of the Congress or the fault of the Department?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Gladly.

Mr. McCORMACK If the Congress last year had adopted the experimental plan on three perishable commodities, and if they had adopted a common-sense agricultural program, which the gentleman will not vote for and which his party opposes, where the consumer can get the benefit of the operation of the law of supply and demand, then, that is the fault of Congress.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I do not want my minute to run out because I am glad to find an authority on the Brannan plan. I wish the distinguished majority leader would tell us the details of the plan and how much it will cost.

EXPLANATION OF CERTAIN PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I shall ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table two classes of bills that were amended in the Senate. They were private immigration bills. In one case the Senate added an amendment requiring the payment of the $18 visa and head tax; and the other type of bills relates to fiancées. In these cases the fiancées became brides, and the amendment became necessary.

PIETER CORNELIS TEN WOLDE AND FAMILY

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 714) for the relief of Pieter Cornelis ten Wolde and family, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after "date" insert "upon payment of the required head taxes and visa fees."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HART). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM RICHARD GEOFFREY MALPAS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 1038) for the relief of William Richard Geoffrey Malpas, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, notwithstanding the provisions of the eighth category of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (8 U. S. C. 136 (c)), William Richard Geoffrey Malpas, a native and citizen of Great Britain, may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence if he is found otherwise admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARNE GORDON WESTLY

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 1609) for the relief of Arne Gordon Westly, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 7, strike out "therein" and insert "upon the payment of the required head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VICTOR C. KAMINSKI

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 2226) for the relief of Victor C. Kaminski—also known as Victor Kaminski—with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, strike out "therein" and insert "upon the payment of the head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARTIN KENNETH IKEDA

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 2705) for the relief of Martin Kenneth Ikeda, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out all after "laws." over to and including line 3, page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DR. ALI REZA BASSIR

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 3009) for the relief of Dr. Ali Reza Bassir, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Lines 8 and 9, after "residence" insert "upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CAMILLA FABRIS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 3018) for the relief of Camilla Fabris, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 7, after "residence" insert "upon the payment of the required head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us where these people are now and where they expect to live if they come in here?

Mr. WALTER. All of these people, with the exception of the Japanese brides, are in the United States and are all over the country. Some of them are doctors and others are people of peculiar and special skills that we recently agreed would be an asset to our economy if they remained.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman know how long they have been in here on an average?

Mr. WALTER. I would say about 5 years.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. My purpose in asking these questions is that I have a couple in my district and I was wondering how I could get them in or how I could get permission for them to stay here. I will see the gentleman afterward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DR. TA FU WU

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 4532) for the relief of Dr. Ta Fu Wu, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 7, after "States", insert "upon the payment of the required head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

KRIKOR G. GUIRAGOSSIAN

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 4903) for the relief of Krikor G. Guiragossian, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 6, after "residence", insert "upon the payment of the head tax and visa fee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MINDEL MALEK

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 5355) for the relief of Mindel Malek, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, notwithstanding the provisions of section 331 of the Nationality Act of 1940 (8 U. S. C. 731), as amended, Mindel Malek may, if otherwise eligible under all other applicable provisions of the nationality laws, file the petition for naturalization prescribed by law."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE TAN

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 5541) to amend Private Law No. 463, Seventy-sixth Congress, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, for the purpose of the immigration and naturalization laws, the alien, William Lawrence Tan, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of December 1, 1934, at the port of Honolulu, Hawaii."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of William Lawrence Tan."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MITSUE MIYAMOTO

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6589) for the relief of Mitsue Miyamoto, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That, in the administration of the immigration laws, the provisions of section 13 (c) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, which excludes from admission to the United States aliens who are ineligible to citizenship, shall not apply to Mrs. Cloice Howard Bryan (nee Mitsue Miyamoto), the wife of a citizen of the United States and an honorably discharged veteran of World War II."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HELGA HOLLEB

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6747) for the relief of Helga Holleb, with a Senate amendment thereto and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 5, after "natural-born", insert "alien."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ARTHUR CHEN SHU JEE

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6756) for the relief of Arthur Chen Shu Jee, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That the provisions of section 2 of the act of December 17, 1943 (8 U. S. C., 1946 ed., sec. 212a), which requires that Chinese alien children of United States citizens shall be charged to the immigration quota for the Chinese, shall be held and considered not to be applicable to Arthur Chen Shu Jee, the son of Doctor Kenneth Chen Huan Jee."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. KYOKO NAKAMURA KORNHAUSER

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6787) for the relief of Mrs. Kyoko Nakamura Kornhauser, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out all after "States" over to and including "filed" in line 3, page 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. KIYO NARUMI MURAKAMI AND KEIKO NARUMI

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6880) for the relief of Mrs. Kiyo Narumi Murakami and Keiko Narumi, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after "natural-born", insert "alien."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. NOBUKO ETO HEARD

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 6894) for the relief of Mrs. Nobuko Eto Heard, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 10, strike out all after "States" down to and including "filed" in line 13.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

HISAKO SAKATA IKEZAWA

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7035) for the relief of Hisako Sakata Ikezawa, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, in the administration of the immigration laws, the provisions of section 13 (c) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, which excludes from admission to the United States aliens who are ineligible to citizenship, shall not apply to Mrs. Hisako Sakata Ikezawa, the wife of a citizen of the United States and an honorably discharged veteran of World War II."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. TOMO NONQUE ROSEVEAR III

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7047) for the relief of Mrs. Tomo Nonque Rosevear III, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Line 7, strike out "III."

Line 8, after "Rosevear" insert "III."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act for the relief of Mrs. Tomo Nonque Rosevear."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. MARIA SALOME HOLLAND

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7096) for the relief of Mrs. Maria Salome Holland, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows.

Line 9, after "stay", insert ", upon payment of the required visa fee and head tax."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ERIO LOUIS TOMITA AND FUMIKO TOMITA

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7292) for the relief of Erio Louis Tomita and Fumiko Tomita, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert "That the provisions of the immigration laws relating to the exclusion of aliens inadmissible because of race shall not hereafter apply to Fumiko Tomita, the Japanese fiancée of Louis W. Ward, a citizen of the United States and an honorably discharged veteran of World War II, and her child, Erio Louis Tomita, and that said Fumiko Tomita and her above-named child may be eligible for visas as nonimmigrant temporary visitors for a period of 3 months: Provided, That the administrative authorities find that the said Fumiko Tomita is coming to the United States with a bona fide intention of being married to said Louis W. Ward, and that they are found otherwise admissible under the immigration laws. In the event the marriage between the above-named parties does not occur within 3 months after the entry of Fumiko Tomita and her child, they shall be required to depart from the United States and upon failure to do so shall be deported in accordance with the provisions of sections 19 and 20 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (U. S. C., title 8, secs. 155 and 156). In the event the marriage between the above-named parties shall occur within 3 months after the entry of Fumiko Tomita and her child, the Attorney General is authorized and directed to record the lawful admission for permanent residence of them as of the date of their entry into the United States, upon the payment by them of the required visa fees and head taxes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

DAIJIRO YOSHIDA

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7315) for the relief of Daijiro Yoshida, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, in the administration of the immigration laws, the provisions of section 13 (c) of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (U. S. C., title 8, sec. 213 (c)), which excludes from admission to the United States persons who are ineligible to citizenship, shall not hereafter apply to Daijiro Yoshida, minor son of Suzuko Yoshida, an American citizen, and that the said Daijiro Yoshida may be permitted to enter the United States as a nonquota immigrant for permanent residence if he is found to be otherwise admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

SUZUKO YAGI AND ANNE YAGI

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 7363) for the relief of Suzuko Yagi and Anne Yagi, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert: "That the provisions of the immigration laws relating to the exclusion of aliens inadmissible because of race shall not hereafter apply to Suzuko Yagi, the Japanese fiancée of Andrew Bacnik, a citizen of the United States and an honorably discharged veteran of World War II, and her daughter, Anne Yagi, and that said Suzuko Yagi and her above-named daughter may be eligible for visas as nonimmigrant temporary visitors for a period of 3 months: Provided, That the administrative authorities find that the said Suzuko Yagi is coming to the United States with a bona fide intention of being married to said Andrew Bacnik, and that they are found otherwise admissible under the immigration laws. In the event the marriage between the above-named parties does not occur within 3 months after the entry of said Suzuko Yagi and her daughter, they shall be required to depart from the United States and upon failure to do so shall be deported in accordance with the provisions of sections 19 and 20 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917 (U. SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 20 minutes .

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed at the conclusion of the special orders heretofore granted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, the attention of the Members of this House has been drawn many times to the present proceedings of the Federal Communications Commission against Radio Stations WJR, of Detroit, WGAR, of Cleveland, and KMPC, of Los Angeles, the principal stockholder of these radio stations being Mr. George A. Richards. The Federal Communications Commission is threatening to deprive these stations of their licenses to operate because they allege that Mr. Richards had these stations "slant" the news. The Federal Communications Commission instituted these proceedings because of complaints filed with it by former discharged employees of these stations. In its prosecution of this case the Federal Communications Commission saw fit to use, as its star witness, a man by the name of Clete Roberts, who was one of the individuals filing a complaint and who also was a discharged employee. While on the witness stand, and under oath, this particular witness classified all the Italians in southern Italy as a "lazy and indolent people" and further stated that they were "not worth a tinker's damn."

On Wednesday, May 3, the Honorable ANTHONY TAURIELLO, Democratic Representative from Buffalo, N. Y., spoke out very forcibly against the Federal Communications Commission's support of this type of witness and against the conduct of the Federal Communications Commission in this case. On Tuesday, June 6, the Honorable STEPHEN M. YOUNG, the Democratic Representative at Large from the State of Ohio, supported the remarks of Congressman TAURIELLO and made his position very clear as to these present proceedings. On June 13 Congressman TAURIELLO again attacked the Federal Communications Commission and concluded his attack in joining with Congressman YOUNG in requesting that you, Mr. Speaker, designate a committee of both Republicans and Democrats to confer with the Federal Communications Commission immediately so that this House could have a full, nonpartisan report made to it with all the facts on the table.

Mr. Speaker, this particular case presents some very interesting questions which it would be well for us to take cognizance of at this time. I do not know Mr. Richards. I am not a listener to the stations involved. I have, however, made a thorough investigation of this matter and find that the Federal Communications Commission is well on the way to having a national issue come out of this case. For instance, I find that on Monday, March 13, Senator HOMER FERGUSON made a speech on the floor of the Senate with direct reference to this case, in which he inserted an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post captioned "Must propaganda be the monopoly of our leftists". Following this speech by Senator FERGUSON I find that on Tuesday, April 11, Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, made a speech about this case on the floor of the Senate in which he inserted an editorial from the Washington Post which was captioned "Shadow of the censor." On Thursday, March 30, Senator BRIDGES continued his attack against the Federal Communications Commission. On Thursday, April 20, Senator BRIDGES still continued his attack against the Federal Communications Commission. On May 3, as I above mentioned, Congressman TAURIELLO spoke and attacked the Federal Communications Commission's conduct of this case with specific reference to its support of such witness as Roberts. On Wednesday, May 10, Senator FERGUSON returned to attack in opposing the reorganization plan of the Federal Communications Commission. On Tuesday, June 6, as I also related above, Congressman YOUNG called for a nonpartisan approach to the very serious issues presented in this matter and, as also related, as late as Tuesday of this week, Congressman TAURIELLO demanded that some method be found through which it could be ascertained whether or not the Federal Communications Commission intended to continue to support their star witness, Clete Roberts.

Mr. Speaker, if the Members of this House will read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD covering the remarks made in both the Senate and the House on this case as I have outlined them by date today, they will easily see that the Republican spokesmen are contending that the only thing at issue in these particular proceedings is the right of Mr. Richards to hold and to express his personal opinions. They contend that the Federal Communications Commission, when it charges Mr. Richards with having ordered the news "slanted," uses these charges solely for the purpose of exploring what is actually the personal and private opinions of Mr. Richards, and that by attempting to conduct their case on this premise they are usurping a power that it was never intended they should have. In other words, their charge is that the Federal Communications Commission is now attempting to control the thoughts of holders of radio station licenses and that their conduct in this case is very definitely one of "political censorship." As Congressman YOUNG and Congressman TAURIELLO have so aptly stated, the preservation of freedom of speech is certainly not one that the Republican Party can alone take credit for supporting. Furthermore, if the Federal Communications Commission does have in mind the hope that they will control what an individual radio station licensee thinks—or if they hope to bring about any form of censorship—then I, as an American citizen and a Democrat, line up solidly with the viewpoints of my colleagues in this House.

Mr. Speaker, it ought to be very clear to all of us just why the Republicans are so interested in this case. It also ought to be a solemn duty of ours to have a quick determination made as to whether or not the conduct of the Federal Communications Commission up to this time in this case has been beyond reproach. I take this privilege of pointing out to this House that when the Federal Communications Commission puts on the witness stand a man of the type of their star witness Roberts, and when this type of a witness makes such defamatory and ill-founded, such defamatory and stupid and such defamatory and insulting remarks against the Italian people, that these remarks have not gone unnoticed in any section of Italian-Americans in the United States of America. I say to my party today that like all of us, no one could be more prideful of my ancestry than I am. I also say to my party that this man Roberts—when he refused to recant and apologize—in fact, gentlemen, he took the position as a witness for the Federal Communications Commission that these remarks were true and that he would stand by them—I say to you gentlemen that as a result of this every Italian newspaper in the country has been alerted and has criticized with scathing denunciation the Federal Communications Commission for supporting this type of a witness. I am now given to understand that these particular proceedings began again yesterday in Los Angeles and that the Federal Communications Commission—who must now begin its case over again due to the death of the former trial examiner—refuses to give Congressman TAURIELLO, and others, any answer as to whether or not it is their intention to put this witness back on the stand. This man may even at this moment be repeating under oath what I have already told you he has stated in the prior hearing.

Can you blame Mr. Hugh Fulton, who is the chief trial counsel for these stations, for excoriating and ripping this type of a witness to pieces and contending that he is not getting a fair hearing? Are we so naive that we cannot see how much damage an irresponsible individual like this man Roberts could do if we did not take steps to repudiate him as any good American should repudiate him? What then is the Federal Communications Commission hoping to accomplish? Can it be true that out of personal pique or spite or prejudice they have made up their minds to get this man Richards and to deprive these stations of their licenses because he held personal opinions which are against our administration? Can this be true? Is it that they started something that they are now realizing is akin to having the bull by the tail and they do not have the intestinal fortitude to recognize it at this time? I do not know what the issues are, but I do know that when an agency of my Government has to use the type of a witness as this man Roberts, there is something radically wrong with that agency of my Government. I do not intend to face my own constituents without my people knowing how resentful I am of such defamatory and scurrilous remarks. I want them to know that I will never support any agency of my Government or of my party that has to engage in the use of such a type of witness. Why is it that in all this time there has not been one word from any Commissioner or any employee of the Federal Communications Commission in which they could have at least made the simple, honest statement that insofar as that part of the testimony of Mr. Roberts is concerned wherein he attacked the Italian people, we, ourselves, repudiate such remarks. Why is it that there has not been one word from them or from anyone else of apology to the Italian-Americans in this country of ours because of what I have related? I said in the beginning that the Federal Communications Commission, by its conduct of this case, was rapidly creating what could easily be a national issue. I say further that if the witness is put on the witness stand again by the Federal Communications Commission, the snowball of attack that is so rapidly increasing in size and momentum will reach proportions of no uncertain dimensions throughout the length and breadth of this country.

Mr. Speaker, may I seriously hope that the remarks of my esteemed colleagues from Ohio and New York—as well as mine today—will be given immediate and whole-hearted attention.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, last year the House of Representatives adopted House Resolution 298 establishing a House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities. This committee was instructed, under the resolution, to investigate all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote or retard legislation. It was also instructed to investigate all activities of agencies of the Federal Government intended to influence, encourage, promote or retard legislation.

A committee of seven members was appointed by the Speaker, with myself as chairman. Appointed to this committee were Representatives LANHAM, of Georgia; ALBERT, of Oklahoma; DOYLE, of California, on the Democratic side; and, on the Republican side, Mr. HALLECK, of Indiana; Mr. BROWN of Ohio; and Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota.

This committee organized in early October, and a week later held a further meeting in which the chairman, by motion, was authorized to proceed with the selection of the staff and to conduct preliminary investigations into the subject matter of this inquiry, during the congressional recess.

In November and December of last year, acting under the committee's specific authority, I organized a small staff of qualified people. I have several times invited the minority members of the committee to suggest persons for staff positions but they have preferred to leave that responsibility entirely to me. I interviewed a great many applicants and in addition, asked others who did not apply for jobs to see if they would serve. In every case I satisfied myself that the men and women I selected were competent persons and good citizens. They have adhered to the policies established by the committee, and in day-to-day operations have followed my instructions. I am proud of them all.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] has sometimes stated that he does not know who are the members of the staff. I cannot understand those statements. Last January every member of the committee, including the gentleman from Ohio, was given a list of the employees and their experience, and a number of the employees have attended executive and other committee meetings. At a meeting of the committee in February the employment and identity of several investigators temporarily borrowed with the consent of the House Committee on Administration, from one of the investigative agencies of the Government were likewise described to the members of the committee, including the gentleman from Ohio. Furthermore, of course, all employees, including stenographers, together with the compensation paid, are a matter of public record at the disbursing office and are reported semiannually in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio has also implied that the investigators of the committee are sometimes given blank subpenas signed by me. I have repeatedly assured the gentleman from Ohio that he need have no concern on this score. I have never signed a blank subpena but only detailed, specific subpenas in connection with particular investigations as the need has arisen.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at this point since he has mentioned my name?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to say to the gentleman and to the House it is true and correct that I made the statement that I did not know who was serving on the staff of the committee. It is also correct, as the gentleman has stated, that he has informed me that he did file or did furnish a record of employees back in January, which has been placed in a folder which has been in the committee room with my name on it, and which I had not seen until yesterday. If I remember correctly all the statements made yesterday in committee, the statement was also made that mention of some of these employees was contained in the official transcript of one of the committee meetings at which I was not present.

However, I would like to inquire of the gentleman: Is it not a fact that on yesterday you informed us as to the employment of a number of members of the staff who were not employed or included in the list which you said was furnished in January some time, and which I have stated I did not have the opportunity of seeing?

For instance, Miss Belle Zeller; when was she employed by the committee? She was not on the list. She had been a witness before the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I might say in answer to the gentleman that the list, as mentioned, covered all those persons who were at that time employed, and at the executive session yesterday we listed those persons who have recently been employed by the committee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I appreciate that statement, but is it not a fact that on yesterday you informed us of members who were employed since then?

Mr. BUCHANAN. At the executive session yesterday we listed those persons who have recently been employed by the committee and put on the list in the past month or so. I am not responsible for the gentleman's folder. As every member of the committee was satisfied that they had with them, and you stated at the executive session in February you had read very carefully everything that had gone on in the executive session in January and which had been recorded in the stenographic transcript of the January sessions, I do not feel it is my duty as chairman of this committee to see to it that the folder is carried around by me and read to the gentleman from Ohio. I feel as a member of the committee that it is his duty and responsibility to avail himself of that information.

I am sure, had he sought it our earlier, he would have been able to obtain that information. The gentleman has a great deal more experience in these matters than I have, and I am sure he knows about the procedures and rules of the House.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to say to the gentleman and to the membership of the House, of course the gentleman from Minnesota joined with me in saying he had not found or seen the information which was on tissue paper on the back of the folder. I am not at all confident as to when that was placed in the folder alluded to, which was kept in the possession of the committee and not in my personal possession, and was held there only for use during the sessions. I would also like to make very, very clear, and I think the gentleman should state publicly that that is the fact, that quite a number of the members of the staff who were listed yesterday were not made available to the committee until yesterday, after I brought up the question as to who was employed. I therefore at this time would like to ask whether or not anyone ever did serve the committee free of charge or has donated their services, as some of the newspapers carried the story.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In answer to the latter question, no one has ever been employed on this committee without compensation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Has anybody served the committee without compensation?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No one has served this committee without compensation.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Did Mr. Little donate his services? He is a very wealthy man.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He has been on that committee since December 1, 1949, and received a check for the month of December and each month since then.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. And each month since. The reason I asked was the Pittsburgh papers did carry a story that he was donating his services.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I as chairman and you as a member of the committee cannot be held accountable for what some newspapers may state.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The Pittsburgh paper was very caustic in its criticism. Neither you nor I are responsible for that. But I would like to ask when did Miss Belle Zeller begin to serve the committee? Was she on the payroll in May? I think she went on the payroll in May, but did she volunteer before that time?

Mr. BUCHANAN. She was never a volunteer. Any research work she has done she has been paid for.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sure the gentleman does not object to the members of the committee if they do not know, stating publicly that they do not know, and inquiring about these matters. I certainly think that is our duty and our responsibility and our right and privilege to inquire. That is the reason I have inquired.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In answer to the further question which the gentleman has brought before the House, I think the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] sitting alongside him did attend the meeting in January. He had in his possession a folder with the list of people who were at that time employed on the committee. From time to time there have been a few changes. Most of them have been people who have been borrowed from Government service and have since returned. We have secured permission to use them through the House Committe on House Administration, and compensated those various departments on a reimbursable loan basis.

I might direct a question to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], whether or not he recalls having that folder in his possession at the January executive session of the committee, and whether or not those names were included in that list.

Mr. HALLECK. Speaking for myself, I must say to the chairman I was present at the meeting in January where there was some discussion of the number of members of the staff, and I had in my folder mimeographed sheets that gave brief personal records of what I understood were then members of the staff. I do not know whether anyone else saw their folder. But for myself, since the gentleman has inquired of me, I did have that information.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for his very affirmative statement.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from California, member of the committee.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee. That folder, such as described, was furnished me on that date, and each member of the committee. There was no limitation, no restriction as to taking it away from the committee room. There was no request made that it remain in the room, that I ever heard. I took mine to my office from time to time after every meeting. I wish to say this: That as far as the subpena is concerned, the chairman of the committee phoned me long distance at Long Beach, Calif., on the morning of May 26, and got me out of bed at 6:30 o'clock in the morning. I was at home in connection with a primary election. He asked if I would approve of his use of the subpena. I wired him that I would do so.

I wish to say to the House that so far as I know the chairman has worked untiringly and fairly, and his effort has been to keep every member of the committee informed. I am sure he has done nothing to warrant this criticism by any member of the committee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I was not at the meeting of January 17 when they say they had the complete records of the employees of the committee; the complete records were not furnished until yesterday.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say to the gentleman that that information was included in his folder. It was a biographical sketch of each and every member employed by the committee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It may have been a sketch but it was not a complete sketch because we have secured more information on the gentleman that you seemingly included. I do not think the gentleman acted with complete candor; the way it was handled was not quite playing it on the level.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not like the gentleman's inference here. I am rather surprised and amazed.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. We had many sessions where we could have been informed, and I might say I was much nearer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania when the question of issuing the subpena was brought up than was the gentleman from California who said he was in California when the gentleman from Pennsylvania telephoned to him. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania did not telephone me or my office, and I was not asked anything about the matter. The committee by its vote on yesterday, of course, settled the matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I think the RECORD bears out affirmatively and definitely what happened yesterday.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman spoke about the committee staff and their qualifications. Is not this man Louis Little a man of considerable property?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He is.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And did he volunteer his services?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He did not.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did he ask to be employed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He did.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And his compensation was fixed at what?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would say roughly at the rate of $750 a month. It may be a few dollars more or less than that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And he is a lawyer?

Mr. BUCHANAN. A very distinguished member of the bar of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And also a professional bondsman, is he not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He is not to my knowledge.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He is not to my knowledge a professional bondsman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I am going to ask permission to insert a list of 50 cases in which a Louis Little, of Pittsburgh, signed bonds as a professional bondsman, the list being taken from the records. There may be more than one Louis Little in Pittsburgh who is a lawyer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is up to the gentleman from Michigan if he cares to do that.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to my distinguished colleague from Alleghany County, who represents the city of Pittsburgh.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman from Michigan implies that being a professional bondsman is unethical. There is nothing unethical about being a professional bondsman. I have no knowledge as to whether this man is a professional bondsman or not, but I know that he has a very distinguished record as a successful lawyer. I am going to defend him because I have known him for 25 years. I never heard a word said against him in a long and honorable career.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I was making no charge against him at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] stated certain things in answer to the gentleman from California and I was inquiring whether or not the staff member acted as a professional bondsman. I am not casting any reflections upon him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. All right. The gentleman's age is 58. I believe he has been practicing in the Pittsburgh area since he was 21 years of age. He is outstanding and distinguished and has the friendship of the bar on both sides, the friendship and respect of various political leaders of divergent political faiths. He is likewise admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and of the Supreme Court of the United States. I am amazed that the gentleman from Michigan saw fit to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on last Thursday a very scurrilous attack upon this gentleman by one Joseph T. Kamp, and he included those as a part of his remarks in the RECORD on a gentleman of the high character and standing of Louis Little of the city of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Who is this Joseph Kamp? I have heard that name before. Is that the party who was held in contempt of Congress?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It is.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Is that the Joseph Kamp the gentleman is referring to?

Mr. BUCHANAN. He was held in contempt and I understand he is to be incarcerated this Friday in the Federal penitentiary for a period of 4 months for refusal to give testimony to a congressional committee of which Mr. CLINTON ANDERSON, of New Mexico, was chairman, the Committee on Election Expenditures in the campaign of 1944. This case has dragged along in the courts for a period of 6 years.

This gentleman was called before our committee on last Tuesday, June 6, and refused to give to our committee any financial statement of his organization's activities. He stated that he was appearing voluntarily, and as yet we have taken no action in this regard. I believe that some of the Members were a bit disappointed that we did not take hasty action. But I am not the kind of a person who is out to belittle any particular individual or to try to persecute any individual. It is rather unfortunate that this individual has run afoul of the law and has to pay the penalty.

Mr. EBERHARTER. As I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, he has reason to believe this attack upon Mr. Little was made by Mr. Kamp as a personal attack by this convicted man who was convicted of contempt of Congress and this personal attack by this man against Mr. Little was put in the RECORD by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is true.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EBERHARTER], that there is no apology coming from the gentleman from Michigan for that insertion which was by unanimous consent and which was a statement offered to the committee by Mr. Kamp when he was denied an opportunity to state his position. I may say that Mr. Kamp for several years has offered a reward of $1,000 for proof of any false statement he made. So there is a chance for the gentleman to get a little fee if the gentleman wants it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just wanted the Congress to know the statements the gentleman is relying on when he puts them in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am not relying on anyone—I was given unanimous consent to include Mr. Kamp's statement offered when he was subpenaed as a witness.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say a note has just been handed me, evidently under the initials of a member of my committee, and it is stated affirmatively, and I would like the gentleman from Michigan to hear this, that Louis Little never has signed a bond and he is not a professional bondsman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is fine, if it is true. I only have what purports to be the records showing a Louis Little as having signed bonds in criminal cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There may be other Louis Littles in Pittsburgh.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Maybe so. This may be a case of mistaken identity.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to refer back to Mr. Kamp and to the reply given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN], which is entirely correct as to the conditions and time under which Mr. Kamp was cited for contempt and finally convicted. I, too, was a member of the Anderson committee and I, too, voted for the citation of Mr. Kamp because I believe that he had failed to answer a lawful subpena of the committee. The inquiry the committee was making was proper at that time and I thought that the court should pass upon the matter. I assure the gentleman that while I have taken the position that every man has a right to a fair hearing, whether it be before a congressional committee or elsewhere, I have not been any particular supporter of Mr. Kamp and I joined with Mr. ANDERSON in voting that citation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want to commend the gentleman from Ohio. This gentleman, Mr. Kamp, was summoned to appear before our committee and did appear. He appeared voluntarily as he stated according to the record. The gentleman from Ohio states that he does not agree with a lot of things this man, Joseph P. Kamp, has done and over his signature has been sending out over the Nation, rather scurrilous literature, and he is reputed to be one of the leaders of a very vicious hate-lobby existing in our country.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. I think it might be well for the membership to know that after the original questionnaire was sent out there was a subsequent letter addressed to the recipients of the original questionnaires that clarified and considerably restricted the scope of the inquiry, and that that undoubtedly has done much to clarify the matter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Rather than restricting the scope, I would say that we did receive a number of telephone calls and telegrams and letters, and we sent out a supplemental letter to clarify those particular points, as the gentleman from Ohio said yesterday, and we have been ready to submit them to a number of organizations that he suggested. Those letters are ready to go out.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield, because I am sure he is attempting to want to be fair in his discussion?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think it should be made very clear to the House that the original request that was sent out to these 166 business concerns was sent out by the chairman without the knowledge or advice—I do not want to use the word "consent"—but without the knowledge and advice of the committee; is that correct?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio that all of the letters sent out have been sent out over the chairman's signature, to all of these groups.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is not the answer.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is my answer and not the words the gentleman would like to have me utter.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to know whether or not the other members of the committee were consulted before the questionnaire was sent out to the 166 corporations?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not think that we put that questionnaire in the hands of committee members until May 31.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. We were not informed; that has been my objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As the gentleman stated yesterday in executive session, he was ready to list a few corporations that he thought possibly had been omitted from the list.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Yes; I first called those to the chairman's attention——

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman will permit me—there were a number of other corporations. And, of course, in compiling any list, regardless of the number, there is just no end to it at all. Where we did get this list, of course, was from the corporations that have filed lobby reports, and we found it was necessary to get additional information, even from a number of organizations that we have studied, and we had financial reports as to corporations that were making contributions to organizations or foundations which engage in lobbying activities.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I would like to have the gentleman say whether or not there was any compulsion on the part of the recipients of these questionnaires to answer them. They were not compelled to answer them, and it was just a questionnaire seeking to get information for the benefit of the committee and, in the long run, for the protection of the very business firms, some of them who are being mulcted by these lobby organizations. Is that the purpose? Am I correct in my statement?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The letter was sent out, of course, as all of the other letters have been sent, in the form of a questionnaire letter asking for information. As I have stated, we have been receiving a very fine response. In only two instances have we had anything critical in the way of a return letter to me, and I would not term them direct refusals.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOYLE. Is it not a fact that the gentleman's sending out of that letter was in due course and under the same procedure as the gentleman has sent out all the letters for and on behalf of the committee? Is it not a fact also that in no case has any member of the committee heretofore registered with the gentleman any criticism or any complaint or suggested any restriction on the chairman's sending out any letters or questionnaires?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is a fairly correct statement.

Mr. DOYLE. I do not know of any committee meetings, or at any time outside the committee hearings, where complaint was made of the procedure the chairman has followed. As a member of the committee, as far as I am concerned may I say that we placed no restriction and no limitation on him whatsoever, although we have been meeting all these weeks and have had plenty of time to do it if we intended that he should not use his own wise discretion in such matters.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman answer that question, so I can ask him another question? Does the gentleman agree with that statement?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I agree with the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. DOYLE]. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Is it not a fact that in the February meeting of the committee when the gentleman first began to discuss the program of hearings I personally insisted that we be informed as to the organizations you have been checking on and whose files you have been going into, and that I then said that some people had been threatened with blank subpenas, and brought the matter to the attention of the committee, and that the gentleman did furnish a list of some 50 firms to whose offices the staff had already gone? Is that correct?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I stated at that meeting, and it is in the stenographic report of that February executive session, that no blank subpenas were ever issued.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to be fair with the gentleman. I believe perhaps he did. Did I complain then and ask about it? Did I not criticize going into the files of these firms?

Mr. BUCHANAN In order to refresh the gentleman's memory, I might say that he was not an attendant at the January meeting. Our policy and procedure was carefully outlined at that time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is correct, because I was at the Rules Committee, which has precedence.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then at the February executive session we had to do the show all over for the gentleman from Ohio so as to bring him up to date on what had gone on.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. But in that February meeting the gentleman had not made a revelation to the committee as to the places you have been and the files you have gone into. In February I insisted on knowing and you did finally file a list of some 50, if I remember correctly, or about 50 of the different organizations into whose files you had gone. Did I not protest and have I not regularly protested just going down one side of the street? Did not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] and I bring out the question of Mr. Ewing and Mr. Brannan and other lobby activities? So there has been some protest. The record is filled with my protests.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman has asked several questions and I should like to answer them in order. The first is, of course, as to the executive session in February at which the gentleman first attended. He was not present at the executive session in January. We had a full staff report, as the transcript of the January executive session reveals. In their statement before the full committee all questions were answered very candidly. They were interrogated by the full committee. Unfortunately, at the January meeting the gentleman from Ohio was not present. Again, at the February meeting, when the question was brought up, he did interrogate the staff and we did furnish for him a list of some preliminary studies and surveys and actual field investigations that had been mentioned. I believe they totaled something like 200 at the time.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. No, about 50.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, 50 actual field investigations and the preliminary studies and surveys amounted to an additional 150.

Now, I shall continue my statement.

As a matter of fact, only a limited number of subpenas have been used or needed at all. Most of the information we have wanted to obtain we have obtained merely by making a request upon the organizations or individuals possessing the information—the information about their own activities. We have obtained most of this information, Mr. Speaker, without any necessity of invoking the subpena powers provided for in House Resolution 298 under which the committee was established.

I think most Members of the House, Mr. Speaker, are familiar with the fact that during the past week—in fact, ever since June 1—there has been some criticism of this committee and of its chairman, both on the floor of the House, and editorials in certain newspapers.

For a number of months, the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities and its staff quietly went about its business of carrying out the instructions of the House of Representatives to investigate all lobbying activities. The committee has proceeded according to the highest standards and methods for conducting a legislative inquiry.

Our first hearings, which are now in print, copies of which have been distributed to every Member of the House and Senate and are available to the public, demonstrated the serious approach which the committee has taken toward its task. One of the first things established in our first hearing was the importance of public opinion as a factor in lobbying. A distinguished psychologist specializing in the field of public-opinion research was our very first witness. He described for us the methods by which public opinion is influenced for or against issues of national policy. The purpose of having him as our first witness was to establish the structure of lobbying from the ground level, the grass-roots level. Congress does not fly into the face of public opinion. Members of Congress are ever trying to assess public opinion on national issues in their own congressional districts. Some Members of Congress even go so far as to distribute periodic questionnaires among a wide group of citizens in their districts to invite the views of those citizens on national issues. They explain that they want to know what the people in their districts believe should be done, the better to represent them in Congress.

Obviously, then, elaborate, well-financed, highly organized mass efforts to influence the public for or against certain legislation, particularly when this is carried on by admittedly lobbying organizations, are proper matters of inquiry for a committee created by the House of Representatives to investigate

"all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation."

An understanding of this form which lobbying has taken, which is one of the most effective techniques of all lobbying activities, is basic in any study of lobbying in this year of 1950. All of our research to date demonstrates that while all lobbying organizations have as their ultimate objective the influencing of the votes of individual members of Congress most of them spend more of their time and their efforts and their money to try to influence the electorate so that the voters in turn can and will report their views to their representatives in the House and the Senate.

In investigating lobbying in specific fields, for instance in housing, the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities was very careful to include in our hearings groups for and against the same legislation and also, in conformance with the terms of the resolution establishing this committee, officials of the Government agency most directly involved. We have tried to be fair and completely impartial. We have adopted the position that we are not investigating views on legislation or the merits of legislation involved in lobbying activities, but rather the methods used, the techniques employed, the money collected and spent. That is all. We want to make sure that the money collected and spent is properly reported under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act and that if it is not so reported, whether that is the fault of the act and indicates the need for revision of the act in order to assure the reporting of this information to Congress. That is our objective and all of our work is directed toward that objective and fits in completely with that objective.

I say, and I believe, that in all of our investigative techniques we have operated in a dignified and straightforward manner. First of all, I invited every Member of the House and of the Senate, through a questionnaire, to provide information, suggestions, and leads for this committee's use, and I received a good number of helpful responses from both Congressmen and Senators. I sent out a similar questionnaire to writers, political scientists, and other specialists and students in the field of pressure groups and pressure politics and we received many helpful suggestions from those sources. In addition, a wide variety of citizens from all walks of life have volunteered information and suggestions for such use as the committee might care to make.

Mr. Speaker, I submit at this point a copy of a press release in the nature of a progress report which I issued in December explaining just how this preliminary work was carried on. It announced that we had already sent investigators into quite a number of organizations to obtain information from their files on their methods of operation. There was no secret about this, although we did keep confidential the names of all organizations which we were investigating, and we have been following that policy right along wherever it has been possible to do so.

STATEMENT BY REPRESENTATIVE FRANK BUCHANAN, DEMOCRAT, PENNSYLVANIA, CHAIRMAN, HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES, DECEMBER 19, 1949

The Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, created by House Resolution 298, was authorized and directed by the House of Representatives earlier this year to investigate "all lobbying activities," including activities of agencies of the Federal Government, "intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation."

We were provided with full subpena powers, and an initial appropriation of $40,000, and were ordered to report our findings and recommendations to the House before the end of the Eighty-first Congress.

The seven-member committee appointed by the Speaker, and which includes Representatives HENDERSON LANHAM, of Georgia, CARL ALBERT, of Oklahoma, CLYDE DOYLE, of California, CHARLES A. HALLECK, of Indiana, CLARENCE J. BROWN, of Ohio, and JOSEPH P. O'HARA, of Minnesota, organized October 11. On October 19, it authorized the chairman to proceed during the congressional recess with the employment of a staff and the conduct of preliminary investigations and research designed to provide a general over-all picture of lobbying activities and the operation of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946.

No decisions were made by the full committee as to what specific lobbying groups, organizations, or individuals, or Federal agencies or officials engaging in lobbying activities might be made the subjects of intensive inquiry and public hearings.

The scope of the inquiry the House has directed us to make into the subject of lobbying is not limited in the resolution in any particular except as to time. Obviously, however, we cannot possibly investigate every individual lobbyist and every individual lobbying practice.

At the same time, it is my hope that before this committee completes its work and makes its report and recommendations to the House, we will be able to answer definitely whether the lobbying law now in operation is being violated and, if so, to what extent and in what manner; also, whether the present act is adequate or requires amendment in order to make it conform to the purposes Congress had in mind in 1946 when it included this unprecedented Federal law on lobby regulation as title III of Public Law 601 of the Seventy-ninth Congress, the historic La Follette-Monroney Legislative Reorganization Act.

I believe, that, as a corollary aim, this committee will try to show the Congress and the American people a clear picture of the extent to which lobbies of all sorts seek to influence legislative action by Congress even when such action may be contrary to the public good and to economy and efficiency in Government.

These are our long-range goals. For the immediate present, however, and until the full membership of the committee has decided upon an agenda of full-scale investigations and hearings, the staff of the committee is engaged primarily and exclusively in the accumulation of essential information of a generally noncontroversial nature, in the compilation of what might be termed a catalog of basic fact on the theory and practice of lobbying.

In recent weeks, in addition to engaging staff members, I have, under the committee's authorization, directed the following staff activities:

1. Assignment of investigators to review the books and records of a number of prominent, acknowledged lobbying organizations for the purpose of obtaining factual information on how some typical lobbies actually operate in their efforts to influence legislative action by Congress. Since there is no particular significance attachable to the selection of these preliminary sources of such information, the committee is not presently making public the names of the groups or individuals being contacted. I might say that, with certain exceptions, cooperation on the part of the lobbyists involved so far in this preliminary study has, on the whole, been satisfactory.

2. Two sets of questionnaires, each containing the same 10 questions, have been directed to all Members of the House and Senate, in one instance, and, in the other, to several hundred scholars and journalists who have made special studies in the past of pressure tactics or of lobbying regulation. These questions—a sample copy of which is attached at the end of this statement—are intended to elicit leads on possible violations of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act or, in the case of lobbying by Federal officials or agencies, of the Criminal Code. They also invite information on lobbying practices generally and on abuses, and ask for suggestions of specific lobbies or Federal agencies or officials whose lobbying activities warrant detailed study and investigation.

3. An additional questionnaire is being prepared for eventual circulation among all of the approximately 2,000 lobbyists and lobbying organizations registered with the Clerk of the House under the lobbying law. These groups and individuals, all directly involved in this entire investigation, will be asked to make recommendations for clarification and improvement of the Lobbying Act as a result of their own experiences under it and will also be invited to suggest specific avenues of intensive investigation.

The advice and suggestions contained in the answers we receive from these questionnaires, plus the information daily coming to the committee from a variety of other sources, including our staff investigations and research, will be compiled and analyzed for the information of the full committee as possible guides to future policies and hearings.

If I have not already made it sufficiently clear, I want to say as emphatically as I can that in any and all cases where investigators of this committee may be disclosed to have examined the files of any lobbyist or lobbying organization, there is no inference warranted that the lobbyist or organization involved is suspected of violating the lobbying law or that the actions of such lobbyists are thought to have been improper in any way. And there would be no basis for a conclusion that the particular lobbyist or organization is to be a subject for all-out investigation or any committee hearings. Our investigators are examining the records of only a limited number out of the many registered lobbyists, and in preliminary fashion only. They are studying these records as examples of typical lobbying practices. The committee itself will decide which groups will be scheduled for thorough study.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES,
December 10, 1949.

Pursuant to House Resolution 298 of the Eighty-first Congress, first session, the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities is undertaking a study and investigation of (1) all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation; and (2) all activities of agencies of the Federal Government intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation.

In light of your past work and interest in this field, the select committee would appreciate receiving from you suggestions and information, based on your experience and study, on the following matters:

1. Lobbying activities by unregistered persons or organizations;

2. Undisclosed receipts or expenditures by lobbyists and lobby organizations;

3. Undisclosed interests behind lobbyists and lobby organizations;

4. Methods of soliciting or obtaining funds for lobby activities;

5. Methods of expending funds for lobby activities;

6. Practices and abuses of lobbyists and lobby organizations;

7. Specific lobbyists and lobby organizations whose activities, in your opinion, warrant detailed study and investigation;

8. Violations of 18 U. S. C., 1913, restricting lobbying activities by Government officers and employees;

9. Practices and abuses of Government officers or employees in regard to lobbying;

10. Specific Government departments, agencies, officers, or employees whose lobbying activities, in your opinion, warrant detailed study and investigation.

The more specific your suggestions and information are, the more useful they will be to the committee. If it is convenient to supplement your response by personal interview, please let me know, so that an informal meeting can be arranged with the members of the committee or its staff.

Yours very truly,

———— ————,

Chairman, Select Committee on Lobbying Activities.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes organizations which we were investigating immediately announced that investigators of this committee were going through their files. This was true, for example, of the National Association of Real Estate Boards, which also announced to its members that our action in sending investigators into their files indicated that the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities was going to concentrate on the housing lobby in an attempt to expose and discredit organizations opposing public housing and rent control. This prediction of theirs arose out of their knowledge of my work on the House Banking and Currency Committee in favor of the legislation they so vigorously opposed and was based on the assumption that I would use my powers as chairman of an investigating committee inquiring into lobbying entirely for the purpose of "getting" the private housing and real-estate groups.

HOUSING LOBBY HEARINGS

Mr. Speaker, I think that in the set of hearings which we held on the housing lobby, covering both sides of the street and including also Housing and Home Finance Agency of the Federal Government, I demonstrated and the entire committee demonstrated by our conduct and our questioning that we were interested only in the facts about lobbying and were not out to "get" any group. The printed copies of this series of hearings will be available shortly and will be distributed to all Members of the House and Senate and made available to the public. This volume, like our first volume of hearings, will show unmistakably the complete fairness of the committee's hearing procedure. This official record of the housing lobby hearing will be the best proof that the committee is carrying out its assigned duties in accordance with proper standards.

A lobbyist, no matter what cause he espouses, is very likely to be in conflict with the voting record and with the views of one or another of the members of our own committee. That is inevitable. But as I said, we tried our best to avoid discussion of the merits of legislation and by and large I think we got along very, very well as a committee throughout that period of hearings.

NEW REPORTING FORM ADOPTED

In the meantime the staff of the committee was continuing its review of the files of a variety of lobbying organizations and public opinion-molding propaganda agencies. Other members of the staff were continuing research into the operations of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act as reflected in the statements being filed under that act with the Clerk of the House. As a result of our work in this direction, a completely new type of reporting form was developed and submitted to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate with the suggestion that they adopt it for use by lobbyists in making their reports for the first calendar quarter of 1950. They agreed to do so. This marked a change in the reporting procedure under the Lobbying Act. It is what I call a "single shot" form, one form which replaced five others then in use. It calls for specific information under specific categories in contrast to the previous forms which merely carried in the form of questions the separate phrases of the requirements of the Federal Regulation of Lobby Act in verbatim terms. The adoption of this new form which was recommended by our committee will, I believe, remove many of the criticisms of the Lobbying Act itself. Some of those criticisms were directed at the previous system of reporting under the act. The new form now in use provides for simplified, uniform, and factual reports to the Congress on the activities and the operations of registered lobbyists.

Following the adoption of the new form, I then wrote to a great many trade associations throughout the United States calling to their attention the provisions of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act and the form used for reporting under it. They were requested, if they felt they did not come within the purview of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act, to fill out the new report form as a questionnaire and return it to us so that we could have some understanding of the extent of legislative activities that they carried on.

We were trying to get information on the extent and nature of lobbying activities so that we would be in a better position to recommend revisions or amendments of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act. We have received a good percentage of responses to that request.

DEFINITION OF LOBBYING

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to a definition of the word "lobbying," as taken from the Yale Law Journal of January 1947, wherein it is defined as:

Any attempt by individuals or groups to influence governmental decisions.

When I first read it aloud at our opening hearing on March 27, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] commented:

I am happy to hear the words of your opening statement, particularly at the conclusion where you refer to that definition "lobbying" which certainly does not give it the sinister, vicious, selfish aspect that sometimes I think people are inclined to attribute to it.

I have said repeatedly throughout this investigation, Mr. Speaker, that it is unfortunate that a popular stigma has attached itself to the word lobbying. One of my goals as chairman of this committee is to try to remove that stigma. Most lobbying is respectable and helpful, so long as it is openly conducted with full disclosure of its financial supports. If the existing law fails to assure such disclosure, amendments should be drafted to achieve that objective as intended by the original act.

During our investigation into a number of the organizations which are operating in what might be considered a twilight zone under the present act—in the field of indirect lobbying through pamphleteering and propaganda—the names of a great number of business and industrial corporations turned up as sizable contributors to these organizations. Some of the contributions were quite large.

When it appeared that sizable contributions were being made by business corporations to organizations engaged in pamphleteering on legislative issues, I felt that this matter should be explored through the use of a letter questionnaire. I sent the letter to some 166 business corporations, most of which had appeared as contributors to one or another of various organizations under study. That was the origin of the letter which has been attacked recently in some quarters. Referring to this letter, United States News and World Report in its Trend of American Business on pages 47 and 48 of the issue of June 9, 1950, said:

LOBBYING INVESTIGATION SHOWS SIGNS OF BECOMING GENUINELY SERIOUS

United States corporations: One hundred and sixty-six of them—are sent a questionnaire on what might be lobbying activity. This list reads like a directory of top business firms.

Information wanted involves money spent on executives' trips to Washington, cost of maintaining a Washington office, outlays for printed matter dealing with public issues, outlays for advertising on public issues, contributions made to organizations that may have some influence on public or congressional policy.

The inquiries are issued by the House Committee on Lobbying Activities. Stated objective is to try to find out if the law regulating lobbying needs improvement. What the committee will get, if corporations reply, is a rather extensive insight into the public-relations activities of leading companies.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to repeat that last sentence "What the committee will get, if corporations reply, is a rather extensive insight into the public-relations activities of leading companies."

We do not care, Mr. Speaker, how much money any business corporation spends for public relations work in the promotion of their products, or their services or for any other purpose related to the conduct of that business. Further, Mr. Speaker, a corporation can spend as much as it wishes to lobby, to influence legislation. There is hardly a business concern in the United States which is not vitally affected by the daily actions of Congress. They have every right to express their views on legislation in any way they care to do so.

But, Mr. Speaker, if these corporations are spending extensively for the purpose of influencing legislation, I think a proper and adequate Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act should provide for the reporting of those expenditures. At the request of one of the minority members of our committee [Mr. BROWN], the National Housing Conference, Inc., which supports public housing, has provided us with the names of every one of its members who contribute as much as $5,000 a year to the furtherance of this organization's objectives. Every member of this organization who happens to be a public official is identified as such in the roster of members provided by the National Housing Conference, Inc., at the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN].

So we have operated on both sides of the street and in the housing lobby we did call on governmental agencies, the housing and home finance agencies, to give a full and complete report of their activities and I believe it was said by all of the people who were called before our committee that the committee leaned over backwards and were very fair in the manner in which the material and the documents were presented to the committee.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In view of this statement, the substance of which was that you were working both sides of the street, was similar information asked of those corporations and organizations which opposed the Taft-Hartley Act? Did you send out a letter to them?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I might say a letter is in preparation and is about ready to go out over my signature to all labor organizations who were registered in the Department of Commerce's journal.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. For example, PAC. It is not a labor organization, but it is said to be an educational organization, as I understand it; will the PAC get one?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The Congress of Industrial Organizations, of course, will get that letter. The Political Action Committee, the PAC, is just one of many committees set up under the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

I might say to the gentleman, something which he well knows, they are registered under the Corrupt Practices Act and file all contributions and expenditures with the proper Government agency.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Perhaps it is unfortunate that list did not go out with the other questionnaire, there might not have been so much criticism. Did Latex get one? Did the department stores, they are big organizations, get one?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I stated here previously, if the gentleman had been listening——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I have been listening.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That at the instance of the gentleman from Ohio, who had mentioned a number of corporations, every one of the corporations he had mentioned is on the list. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] made a request in yesterday's executive session to include certain corporations. I might say at this time that letters will go out to those corporations as requested. Yes; each and every one of those corporations that he mentioned. We can extend this list extensively and widely. Nevertheless, I have put into the RECORD just how this particular list was devised and selected.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did the Kauffman Department Stores get one?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am unable to say at this time. Do you mean the Kauffman Department Stores in Pittsburgh?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not believe they did, because they were not listed as one of the contributors to any of these organizations that we had been checking.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Have they not been advocating certain legislation or opposing it? May I ask one other question? Can you give me the street address and something that I may determine whether or not I have unjustly referred to Louis Little? I find in the telephone directory but one Louis Little, and he is listed as an attorney.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He has a law office at No. 7 Court Place, Pittsburgh.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is the one that is in the directory.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He has quite an extensive staff of his own in a three-story office building. He lives in a very beautiful home. I do not know the particular street number. I know how to get there. It is not in my district. It is in the Twenty-ninth Congressional District, Mr. DAVENPORT'S district. He lives within a block or two of the former Mellon mansion.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Did the gentleman say that I was in error when I said that he had signed bonds?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is correct. He is not a professional bondsman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is your statement?

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is my statement, and I believe verification of this fact has been handed to me by a member of the staff who has talked to Mr. Little. I believe that he is in the House gallery listening to this colloquy.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I will be glad to correct any misstatement I may have made, if I find court records do not refer to the Louis Little who is on the committee staff

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. At the meeting yesterday there were determinations made as to certain people who would appear before the committee. Has the committee generally announced that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. In answer to that, I wish to make the statement, the National Economic Council, Mr. Hart, will be called before the committee on next Tuesday, June 20. I had confirmation by telephone personally from Mr. Hart this morning that he would be glad to appear on Tuesday, June 20.

Subsequent hearings have been scheduled for the other groups that we mentioned, to be followed by the Committee for Constitutional Government; likewise, Americans for Democratic Action; likewise, Public Affairs Institute; and Foundation for Economic Education. As quickly as we can schedule dates, depending on the termination of the hearings for the first few witnesses, they will be announced and the witnesses so informed.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Was that announcement made to the press yesterday by the chairman? The only thing mentioned in the press was the Committee for Constitutional Government.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In the release to the press yesterday I believe I did say that Mr. Hart would be called on Tuesday, June 20.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sorry the gentleman did not include the full agreement in the committee that we would call these other organizations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. You understand, of course, that we try to arrange our hearings to suit the people who are called. Everyone who has been called before the committee, with very few exceptions, has been accommodated, and we have set the hearings to satisfy them. We have actually gone out of our way to accommodate them.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am glad the gentleman made that statement. I would like to say that there will be 2 or 3 days in the week following next week that I will not be able to be present. So I hope I will not be accused of dodging my responsibilities. I want to make that statement so that you can arrange any schedule you wish, just as the gentleman from California, the gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from Minnesota, and others have had to miss certain meetings, just as I missed one, for which I have been criticized, when I had to attend a meeting of the Rules Committee, which was very important.

May I ask one question to clarify that?

Mr. BUCHANAN. So far as the matter of scheduling hearings are concerned I think we have been rather fair with the witnesses.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman was very cooperative in scheduling his meeting on yesterday, and I want to thank him for it because I had a Rules Committee meeting in the morning and he scheduled his meeting in the afternoon so that I could be present. I appreciate that very much.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman and yield now for a further inquiry.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The resolution which the gentleman read requires the committee to do two things: One, to investigate lobby activities of individuals or private concerns which come under the law; and, two, to investigate the activities of Government agencies in attempting to bring pressure on Congress.

The gentleman from Indiana and I believe also the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. O'HARA] did call to the attention of the committee some of the activities of the Secretary of Agriculture, and I believe we also mentioned the activities of a man by the name of Ewing in connection with a certain piece of recent legislation. As I understand, the only action which has been taken by the committee was a letter written to the Bureau of the Budget about the matter. Is that correct?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; a letter was directed to the General Accounting Office to give a full accounting and make a complete report to our committee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I remind the gentleman that we have a Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments which is charged with that very responsibility. Nevertheless, in the housing area that we investigated, we made it a three-sided investigation. In the other instance that the gentleman has specifically mentioned we have made inquiry of the proper Government agency rather than turning it over to our staff of investigators. We wanted the investigation made and the report to come from an impartial source and the gentleman will agree that the General Accounting Office is the agency designed to make that study and render an impartial report.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman advise the House as to whether, regardless of the House Committee on Expenditures, whether he expects to conduct an investigation of the activities of governmental agencies which are bringing pressure on Congress, an investigation which was specifically provided for in the resolution setting up his committee? The House voted those instructions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I say in response that I believe in the housing area of which we made a study that we did do that, and at our instance that question has been followed through asking for complete facts and information for the benefit of the committee. We shall be pleased to check into any Government agency the gentleman so desires.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. We are going off that subject now. We did have Mr. Foley there for 5 minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, just a minute, just a minute.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Not 5 minutes; I withdraw that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is making a gross exaggeration.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I withdraw the 5 and say for a little while.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am sure the gentleman does not want to leave that in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I cross-examined Mr. Foley. I congratulated him on his frank statement. Now I ask exactly whether or not the committee, through its chairman, or its staff, small though the staff may be—and it is a remarkably efficient staff according to the statement of the chairman of the committee—whether or not the committee is going to be as zealous in carrying out the second instruction of the House of Representatives in this resolution as it has been in looking after the right side of the street on these matters; and I am wondering if he is going to include——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Has the gentleman finished his statement?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am also wondering whether he is going to look into the mailing activities of some Members of Congress other than those with whose political philosophies the gentleman disagrees?

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman has asked me a question as to whether I have looked into the mailing activities of certain Members of Congress.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am talking about the gentleman's committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That question was not raised with me as such. I believe that in our executive session yesterday, the closed-door session, there were two instances cited, one from the majority side and one from the minority side, and we reached an agreement among ourselves about this question involving the franking privilege. I know that the inquiry was made, and I believe that the gentleman is in complete accord with the manner agreed upon yesterday in the executive session.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do not know what you refer to. I am asking only as to whether an investigation is going to be made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We are not investigating Members of Congress. We are making a full and complete investigation of the activities, the techniques and practices, and a complete financial accounting, as far as possible, of organizations that are actually engaged in lobbying and legislative activities.

Mr. DOYLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOYLE. I wish to say that I am very sure the record will show that on several occasions our distinguished chairman stated in public sessions of the committee that if any member of the committee of which he is chairman had any specific governmental departments which they wished to be questioned or investigated as to lobbying activities the chairman would like to know which department of the Government it was. As far as I know, at all meetings I was present, there was no suggestion of any governmental department to be checked.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am surprised that the gentleman from California makes that statement because we mentioned specifically the St. Paul-Minneapolis meeting at which Mr. Brannan appeared with public officials who were paid to attend. We also mentioned the activities of Mr. Ewing.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to answer the gentleman's query by affirming the fact that the Brannan trip to the Twin Cities, as well as the Ewing trip to Europe are the two subjects of inquiry we are awaiting a full and complete investigatory report on from the General Accounting Office.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman has not subpenaed them.

Mr. DOYLE. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio I think the record will show that the conversation which he refers to must have occurred in committee when I was present at the primary elections in California.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It was some time before that primary. Perhaps the gentleman is right. The only thing I want to point out is that the committee has not been quite as zealous in prosecuting that end of the resolution or in issuing subpenas to produce documents and records and all kinds of information as to governmental activities as it has been in some other fields. We have been working one side of the street.

Mr. DOYLE. We have not been working one side of the street, I wish to say to the gentleman from Ohio. We may not have been as zealous on both sides of the street as he thought.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I tried to keep it balanced.

Mr. DOYLE. The gentleman did a very good job.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. When no one else wanted to ask a question of someone on the other side of the street I tried to ask the questions to even it up a bit.

Mr. DOYLE. The gentleman did not have to work very hard because I think the attitude of the committee on both sides was to be fair and equal on both sides.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have heard a great many statement to that effect. I do not know what happened.

Mr. DOYLE. I think both sides of the aisle tried to be very fair. I am sure that is the attitude of the committee regardless of what the present statement of the gentleman from Ohio is. The record I think will show we tried to be very fair on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I have a copy of the record and it demonstrates that in several instances.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Unfortunately the position the gentleman would like to put the committee in is that every day of the week we would be investigating Government agencies.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is not correct, but the committee has put itself in a position where even the left-wing newspapers of the country are calling your attention to the fact you are traveling very close to the line. Even the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette in the gentleman's own city has criticized him and said that "BUCHANAN is off the track." Mr. Tom Stokes, who is not on the conservative side to say the least, wrote an article that I read with interest in which he was rather critical of some of the activities of the committee. So I found myself in rather peculiar company at times. It indicates I have been right in some of my criticisms or my left-wing friends and editors would not be agreeing with me and taking the same position. The only one who did not take that position was Mr. Marquis Childs who wrote an editorial saying that the whole investigation has been conducted to get after the right-wing organizations. The chairman of this committee has picked out 166 corporations and has made the statement that he picked them out because they contributed to right-wing organizations; however, he did not say anything about anyone who contributed to left-wing organizations. Again, that has been my objection. I think we ought to play fair on both sides.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not use those terms "left-wing" and "right-wing."

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman did not say so, but he has not been picking them out.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In order to clarify the record, may I say that you have been given a demonstration of some fairness on the part of the committee. We have conducted our hearings in this manner. I might say that the committee hearings themselves will show that in each and every instance the gentleman from Ohio has asked and requested to interrupt the chairman from time to time, and the chairman has been very gracious and yielded to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I do not like to disagree with my friend, but if you read the record of last Wednesday you will find where, when I was questioning a witness, that immediately when the Chair would finish questioning a witness he would say, "Step down," and the minority then would ask a question. But, first the Chair would turn to everyone else on the committee before he would turn to the gentleman from Ohio, or if the gentleman from Ohio was recognized to ask a question he was permitted to ask but one question, and then when he started to ask the next, the chairman would turn around and say, "Is there any question from you, Mr. LANHAM?" and Mr. LANHAM would say "No." And then the gentleman would let me continue questioning. The record speaks for itself.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do say that the record speaks for itself, and I hope that every Member of this House reads that record in its entirety, and if they feel that the chairman was unfair——

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Well, you put that to a vote sometime.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman has the art, of course, of being able to interpose very conveniently into the proper place. I must compliment the gentleman from Ohio. That comes with long years of political experience, and I do not admit that my 4 years here in the House of Representatives can match the long experience of the gentleman from Ohio, especially at being able to interject and to interpose at various points. I have witnessed the gentleman from Ohio in various committees that he has served, and I believe that he will say—after the hearings are over—that he does say many times on the record, "You have been most gracious, Mr. Chairman; in fact, you are one of the fairest chairmen that I have ever been associated with."

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am afraid the record does not recognize sarcasm when one reads it. Some of these statements were made with just a little bit of a tinge of sarcasm.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The only thing about the record, of course, is that it merely quotes the words and it does not reflect the tone in which the words were spoken.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sure the gentleman understood.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to finish my statement; I feel that the time is running out here. I want to say briefly, in summarizing here, that we are not probing any ideas or opinions; that we are making an attempt, a full and complete attempt, in as objective a manner as possible, and I believe that a very careful reading of the hearings and the reports that will be issued will show that we have been most fair and impartial in the consideration of every witness that has appeared before us.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The statement was made on the floor the other day that information has come to the committee that some Congressman had sent out seven carloads—franked out seven carloads of material. Now, do you find any basis for that statement?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We do.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What did you find?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Well, I believe that is a matter that we discussed yesterday in executive session, and I wish the gentleman would reserve his question.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I do not want to embarrass anybody.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me repeat. We are not attempting to reflect on any Member of Congress; in fact, many of the affidavits and documents that have been read before the committee have been most carefully scrutinized. My name has appeared time and time again, and I have not been fearful in any manner whatsoever that a cause I helped to fight for and talk for on the floor of this House was mentioned in any document.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am not finding any fault with any investigation of any Congressman, and I hope the gentleman does not understand me as saying and that no one else understands me as saying that there is any reason why a Congressman should not be investigated just the same as any other individual. But I am amazed somewhat to learn that someone had mentioned seven carloads. I noticed in the press that it cost the Post Office Department about $1,000,000 to send out frankable material sent out by Congressmen, but that the departments had sent out their propaganda at a cost of about $27,000,000, so that we cannot make very much of an answer if we used that franking privilege only to the extent of a million dollars.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that what the Government sends out is not propaganda?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It is not propaganda?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The bulk of the material that is sent out is in the form of booklets and releases to the various administrative agencies throughout the country. I am sure the gentleman is very clear as to his conception of the Corrupt Practices Act, whether anyone in the executive branch or any quasi-judicial agency of the Government is abusing any privilege he has. If he is abusing it, then I know the gentleman knows the proper agency to which to refer it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. And when complaint is made we get nowhere.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I congratulate the gentleman on the statement he has made, that it is not his desire to embarrass any Member of Congress. I should like, however, to point out that reports have come to us that certain statements and certain information that have reached the committee regarding certain Members of Congress have been used to embarrass those Members. One of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle from me has been embarrassed in a campaign he is now conducting for further office.

I wonder if the gentleman will not agree that the gentleman from Ohio, when that matter came up, protested against it and denounced the statement made by the witness or the information and stated publicly that while he was of the opposite political faith and philosophy he disavowed the whole thing, that the gentleman mentioned was a man of honor and integrity and had been a great Member of this body, and that the words of the gentleman from Ohio could be used in his campaign if he so desired to offset any attempt to slander or smear him that might emerge from that. Since that time we have learned that the very statements and the very material have been used against the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I might say the gentleman is very fair in his statement in regard to the gentleman mentioned.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It is to be regretted. I hope that we will not follow this line or not permit it to be followed. That is the one great fear I have, that there can be a misunderstanding of such information.

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is a political year, and we face the congressional elections in November of 1950. In conducting an investigation into such a controversial field, in which the Members on both sides of the aisle are involved, we have been most cautious and deliberate in our hearings. We shall continue to conduct the hearings in the same manner in the future.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette in a column from its Washington staff, appearing June 10, may have put its finger on the cause of the complaints against this committee. I want to quote a few excerpts from this column:

LOBBY PROBE NOW PRODUCING RESULTS, GETTING COMPLAINTS

The Lobbying Investigating Committee has really come to life, and the screams of Congressmen whose pet lobbyists are caught in the wringer are pitiful to hear.

The committee, which the House authorized last fall at the request of President Truman and of which Representative FRANK BUCHANAN, McKeesport Democrat, was named chairman, seemed a long time getting started.

Mr. BUCHANAN, who has leaned over backward to be fair, also made sure of his aim before he started shooting.

At first the hearings turned up little. Observers who didn't know of the vast amount of data the committee has on file thought the inquiry had fallen on its face.

But during the last 2 weeks Mr. BUCHANAN has brought the hearings to bear on what he considers the real evil in lobbying today: Use of tax-free foundations, operating on tax-deductible donations, especially from wealthy corporations, to conduct lobbying in the role of operating a publishing house. These thriving businesses neither pay taxes nor register under the Lobbying Act.

Mr. BUCHANAN believes they wield tremendous influence over legislation, though they deny they are so engaged.

So long as the lobbying investigation brought out little, there was no objection from congressional conservatives.

But in the last 2 weeks they have been raising their voices.

I am particularly gratified to find in this column the statement which I really and sincerely believe is true and is borne out by our records, a statement which says:

Mr. BUCHANAN * * * has leaned over backward to be fair.

During the course of our hearings both majority and minority members of the committee have made similar statements at one point or another in the record.

During the hearings on the National Housing Conference, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] complimented me on the fairness and impartiality that I was demonstrating by making public documents from an organization vigorously supporting legislation that I was advocating as a Member of Congress.

It appears then, Mr. Speaker, that despite efforts on my part cited by minority members of the committee and by the press to be fair and impartial and objective in the conduct of this investigation, the mere fact that I have caused to be circulated a questionnaire among business corporations asking for information on legislative activities suddenly indicates that I am no longer fair and no longer objective. But I assure you, Mr. Speaker, I intend to continue to conduct the committee's operations in a fair and objective manner.

My letter questionnaire to business corporations was never intended to cover every corporation engaged in lobbying activities. It was sent to a representative group. It should provide us with reliable information which we can use as a guide. That is its purpose. There was no conscious effort here to differentiate among corporations for their activities or for the views of any of their officials.

When this letter was sent out on May 31, we received numerous inquiries from corporations asking for some clarification of some of the requests. Members of the staff and I, myself, as well as some of the other members of the committee conferred with representatives of some of these firms to explain some of the questions more specifically so that they would be able to comply with the request without undue burden.

Mr. Speaker, there has to be a rule of reason guiding any congressional committee which is seeking to do a fair and objective job of investigation. None of us on the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities has any desire to unduly overburden any firm.

As a result of conferences and telephone calls with representatives of some of these firms, we decided to send out a supplementary letter making clear some of the points in the original letter which appeared to have caused some problems, and a copy of that letter, which I think is self-explanatory, will be inserted at this point:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE
ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES,
June 10, 1950.

GENTLEMEN: With reference to my letter dated May 31, 1950, requesting certain information for the benefit and use of the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities, the following points should be observed in clarification of the scope of the letter:

(a) Travel expenses: This item is not intended to cover expenses of trips to Washington made for the sole purpose of conducting sales or other business operations, nor is it intended to cover trips for the purpose of handling nonlegislative matters before departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Government.

(b) Washington office: This item likewise is not intended to cover costs of a Washington office maintained solely for sales or other regular business operations, or for handling nonlegislative matters before departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Government.

(c) Printed or duplicated matter: This item does not relate to material dealing with the administration of existing statutes which is distributed to supervisory employees. Expenditures, however, for duplicated or printed matter having legislative significance should not be limited to payments to the eight organizations enumerated in my letter of May 31, 1950, but should include payment to any other organizations which prepare or distribute literature on issues having legislative significance.

(d) Advertising: This item, of course, does not relate to ordinary business advertising, but to institutional or other advertising dealing with public issues having legislative significance.

(e) Contributions: This item does not relate to contributions to charitable or eleemosynary institutions.

If your company has any special problems with respect to my letter of May 31, 1950, that are not covered by the foregoing points, I shall be glad to help resolve them in a way that will provide the relevant facts for the committee's study without unreasonable burdening the respondents.

In some cases, I appreciate that additional time may be required to complete the preparation of information requested. I trust that some sections, however, can be supplied by June 15, 1950, and that the balance may be supplied by June 30, 1950.

Yours very truly,
FRANK BUCHANAN,
Chairman.

While these activities were going on, staff investigators of this committee, who as I said, have been engaged for months in going through the files of a variety of lobbying organizations, obtaining information which the organizations involved, in most cases, freely turned over to them, presented their credentials at the headquarters of several organizations in New York City and asked officials of those organizations for about 26 different categories of material.

Before I go any farther, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the investigators who have been employed and their methods of operation. All have been men of the highest caliber. All have had training and experience in investigative work. Some are members of the bar.

In all of their operations, and they have been pretty widespread and extensive in recent months, they have always conducted themselves in a dignified, proper, and courteous manner. I do not ask that you take my word for that, Mr. Speaker. I did not accompany them personally, and I cannot speak from personal knowledge as an eyewitness. But we have in our files of the committee many letters from officials and organizations into whose offices our investigators have gone to obtain documentary information for the committee, letters expressing appreciation for the courtesy and propriety shown at all times by the committee's staff investigators.

As I said earlier, the informtion sought by these men was supplied immediately by most organizations merely upon request and in a cooperative way without the need for the use of subpenas.

All went reasonably well until the investigators appeared at the offices of three New York organizations: The Committee for Constitutional Government, which during the life of the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946 has reported as receiving and spending about $2,000,000; the National Economic Council which has reported receiving about a half million dollars at the rate of over $10,000 a month; and the Constitutional Educational League which engages in widespread pamphleteering on national legislative issues but which has never filed under the Lobbying Act and whose officials have steadfastly refused over the years to tell any committee of Congress the sources of its funds.

We are not probing opinions or ideas. The views of these three organizations as expressed in their publication and through their lobbying efforts are certainly not my view. Some organizations do not espouse my views while others which we have looked into do espouse views which are much closer to mine.

But we are not investigating views—all members of the committee are agreed on that. At the same time I do not see why the opinions held by any group should make it exempt from investigation as to—not their opinions—but as to their lobbying techniques and expenditures.

When our investigators appeared at the offices of these three organizations and presented their credentials and the list of materials which they wanted to examine for the information of this committee, they ran into some interesting experiences. Officials of all three organizations were quite pleased to turn over copies of pamphlets and other propaganda material which they have issued which might be regarded as having a bearing on legislative issues. Two of the organizations, the two which file under the Lobbying Act, had no hesitation about opening their books to show the total amounts of contributions and receipts of various kinds and also those showing their expenditures. But they steadfastly refused to divulge the names of purchasers of quantity orders of their propaganda publications. The third organization, the Constitutional Educational League, likewise declined to give our men the information requested.

The investigators informed us of these developments. They had not run into situations quite like these in any of their previous investigations. They had found most organizations which they had investigated quite willing to open their files, quite willing to disclose the sources of their income and the names of their contributors. This was something new.

While we were debating the next step, the Committee for Constitutional Government proceeded to file in the Federal District Court for the District of Columbia a petition for injunction seeking to restrain individual staff members of this committee, by name, from even so much as asking for this material. It should be noted, Mr. Speaker, that no subpena up to that time had been issued for this information. A request for it had been made, a courteous request, but no subpena had been issued.

When we were notified of the injunction petition, I consulted a majority of the members of my committee, discussed the matter with them, and we decided to issue subpenas to compel the production of the information we requested. The subpenas were served by inviduals other than those named in the court action of the Committee for Constitutional Government. Subpenas were issued not only on the Committee for Constitutional Government, which had sought to delay and hamper us through the injunctive process, but also on the National Economic Council and on the Constitutional Educational League.

A subpena was served on the National Economic Council, because Merwin K. Hart, president of that council, had indicated to our investigators that he would follow whatever decision the Committee for Constitutional Government made about complying with our requests for information on the sources of their funds. Since the Committee for Constitutional Government had reacted to our request by filing a petition for an injunction against our staff members, it was assumed that Mr. Hart would also decline to comply. As for the Constitutional Educational League, its executive vice chairman, Joseph P. Kamp, was already under sentence for refusing to give a congressional investigating committee in a previous inquiry any facts about the sources of his organization's funds and he had not shown any inclination to cooperate with our investigators. That is why the subpenas were issued. In all three cases it was a clear and outright refusal to give us voluntarily information of a sort we had been obtaining without difficulty on a voluntary basis from a variety of other organizations.

I believe it would have been most unfair, both to the Congress which ordered this investigation and to the organizations which previously complied voluntarily with requests from us for information, if we were then to accept casually the refusal of a few groups to supply data needed to carry out properly the study we were ordered to make by this House of Representatives.

It seems, however, Mr. Speaker, that we did not take into consideration the tremendous sources of support which these three organizations seem to enjoy within the Congress of the United States and among some newspapers.

In any event after the subpenas were issued for return on Tuesday, June 6, I was personally denounced on the floor of the House, which is something rather new and novel for me. Newspapermen informed me of all sorts of rumors floating around the Hill portending doom for this committee for having had the gall to seek to find out the names of individuals and corporations supporting organizations such as the Committee for Constitutional Government, the National Economic Council, and the Constitutional Educational League.

I hesitate to characterize any organization until I am sure of the facts and it is not my intention here today to discuss the views held by these organizations or to characterize them.

HOW THEY LOBBY

I believe in letting the facts on these lobbying organizations speak for themselves. As an investigator of lobbying activities I am interested in how they lobby, not what they lobby for or against.

Hearing on return of the subpenas was set for June 6 at 10 a. m. We were not able to achieve a quorum, however, until nearly 10:50 a. m., when two of the minority members of the committee appeared. One of the majority members was out of town and the remaining three of us did not, of course, constitute a quorum of the seven-member committee. so it was necessary to wait for one or more of the minority members to be present. When they appeared the hearing began with Merwin K. Hart of the National Economic Council as the first witness.

MERWIN K. HART, NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. Hart reported that he had brought along with him the material that had been subpenaed but he stated that he was appearing voluntarily rather than in answer to the subpena.

Mr. Hart, as I said, stated that he had brought along with him the material that had been subpenaed, and added that he would turn it over to me and to the committee if we would first permit him to make a statement. Before allowing him to proceed with his statement, I insisted that he show us the material he had brought with him to make sure that it did in fact comply with the subpena. He showed us his material; it appeared to be the material we had requested; I then permitted Mr. Hart to proceed with his statement in full.

The gist of his statement was that the information he was giving us on individuals and corporations providing as much as $1,000 to his organization between January 1, 1947, and May 1, 1950, was a very confidential list which he hoped we would not let out of our hands and not make public. But he did turn this information over to us, and we have it for such use as the committee may determine.

JOSEPH P. KAMP, CONSTITUTIONAL EDUCATIONAL LEAGUE

The next witness was Joseph P. Kamp, of the Constitutional Education League, a pamphleteering organization which takes a very definite position on pending legislative issues. Mr. Kamp does not file as a lobbyist and his organizadoes not report as a lobbying organization.

He was asked if he had brought with him the material subpenaed, namely, such books and records that would show his financial backers. Although he had had at least 10 days to gather the requested records, when I asked Kamp how long it would take him to get the material together, he replied that "before I could begin to do the job" he would have to have it proved to him that the operations of his organization come under the jurisdiction of our committee—a committee, I might add, which has been ordered to investigate "all lobbying activities intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation." Kamp's outfit prepares and distributes extensive propaganda material on national and legislative issues.

I told him that he was excused. The following exchange occurred—page 32:

Mr. BROWN. Will the minority members be permitted to ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWN. Thank you very much.

If you were permitted to make a statement to this committee, as you have requested, and after you had completed your statement the committee decided that you did come under the law and that you should furnish this material, would you then be ready to furnish it?

Mr. KAMP. Then I would either have to furnish the information or suffer the consequences. I would be perfectly willing to, one or the other.

The arrogance, the effrontery, the contemptuousness of this witness, Mr. Speaker, was simply incredible. He appeared to be inviting us to cite him for contempt. The man apparently feels he has nothing to lose by showing contempt for Congress because he was at that time awaiting commitment to serve a 4-month prison term for contempt of a previous congressional committee in 1944. It has taken 6 years for the processes of law to catch up with him and to make his conviction stick and he has avoided jail for 6 years quite successfully, but his freedom is now about to end. Apparently he was conscious of that and his attitude reflected a what-difference-does-it-make-now philosophy.

I repeat, we are not investigating anybody's views. Joseph Kamp's ideas are not our concern as a committee. It is our concern, however, and it is the concern of this Congress to know who are the financial backers of Kamp's organization.

One of the minority members of our committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] had this to say as Kamp prepared to leave the witness stand—page 33:

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Kamp, I asked those questions only to clarify the record. I want to be absolutely frank with you and the committee. I have not had too good an impression of some of your activities in the past, but I do not intend to judge you on this matter because of things you may have done in the past, that I disapproved of most heartily.

EDWARD A. RUMELY, COMMITTEE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

The next witness in answer to a subpena on June 6 was Edward A. Rumely, executive secretary for the Committee for Constitutional Government, a man and an organization whose activities appear to be sacred and above reproach—and also exempt from any congressional investigation—by a surprising number of individuals here and by some newspapers.

Rumely was instructed in his subpena to bring the same sort of information as was subpenaed in the other two cases. Like Kamp, he took the position that certain areas on which we asked for information are "outside of your power"—page 38. In these areas he did not provide and refused to provide the information requested; that is, "receipts from the sale of books, or the identity of purchasers of books"—page 39. He added, "I don't mind giving the total income, but not the identity of the purchasers of books and literature."

There resulted at that point a discussion within the committee as to whether the witness should be permitted to read a statement he had distributed to the press for release on delivery which explained his reasons for not producing the material requested. I had instructed him not to read his statement and to step down unless he agreed to provide the information asked of him in the subpena. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] objected and asked that the witness have an opportunity to explain what he had brought with him and to explain "what he doesn't feel that he should furnish under this subpena"—page 40.

I agreed to allow that to be done. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANHAM] objected to his reading any statement until he had complied with the committee's subpena, although he agreed to allow the witness to answer direct questions from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN]. These questions continued from page 42 to page 67 with other members of the committee, of course, participating, particularly on the issue of whether the Committee for Constitutional Government, which is registered under the Lobbying Act as a lobbying organization, enjoys immunity under the Constitution from being required to reveal the names of individuals or corporations which furnish it funds through the purchase of books or other literature in large quantity orders. It is the position of the Committee for Constitutional Government, as expressed by the witness Rumely, that Congress is not entitled to have this information.

Literature distributed by CCG on a mass basis concerns subjects pertinent to legislative issues. CCG maintains lists of legislators, professional people, and others, and solicits orders for quantity purchases of such literature for distribution among persons on the lists.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, they have these lists. You just send CCG your money and designate the lists of people to whom you want them to send the literature. You can order 1,000 copies of a book or pamphlet for legislators, or 100,000 for lawyers, and so on.

Is the influence of this kind of distribution of literature intended, directly or indirectly, to influence Members of Congress to vote against legislative proposals to which CCG, as a registered lobbying organization is violently opposed?

That is one of the questions which the Select Committee on Lobbying Activities will carefully consider at its further hearings, starting next week.

CCG and NEC work very closely together. As I said, our investigators found that out when they visited the two organizations in New York. Hart said he would be bound by whatever Rumely decided to do about complying with our request for information on this specific issue of the sale of publications. As it turned out, Hart finally decided to come through with the material even though Rumely defied a subpena and refused to produce it.

Hart turned over to us a list of all contributions or receipts of $1,000 or more for the period between January 1, 1947, and May 1, 1950, including receipts from the sales of books. I have analyzed this material somewhat hurriedly and what I find there is very interesting. From the time the National Economic Council first began filing quarterly financial statements under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act until its report for the fourth calendar quarter of 1948, filed early in 1949, Hart and the NEC never differentiated in their lobbying reports between receipts from outright contributions and receipts from the sale of literature. All were reported for the purposes of the Lobbying Act as receipts. Individuals or corporations which the material which he has turned over to this committee in answer to the subpena indicates purchased sizable volumes of literature costing $500 or more during the period January 1, 1947, to October 1, 1948, all seem to be listed on NEC's official sworn lobbying statements as having made contributions of $500 or more. Therefore, it is obvious that until early 1949 when he adopted a different method of reporting under the Lobbying Act, Hart and the NEC regarded these bulk purchases of literature not as sales made by a publishing house, but as contributions to a lobbying organization.

I would like to insert here an article and an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of a few days ago on this matter:

BIG NAMES LISTED AS BACKERS OF ORGANIZATION IN LOBBY INQUIRY—UNION CARBIDE, TEXAS CO., DU PONT FAMILY MEMBERS AMONG CONTRIBUTORS TO NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

(By George H. Hall)

WASHINGTON, June 8.—Some of the biggest individual and corporate names in America are on an unpublished list of contributors to Merwin K. Hart's National Economic Council, an organization now under investigation by the House Lobby Committee.

Hart turned over the list to the committee on Tuesday when he appeared in Washington in answer to a subpena. He asked Chairman FRANK BUCHANAN, Democrat, of Pennsylvania, to hold the list in confidence to prevent its use by smearers. The document has been kept in a locked safe pending consideration by BUCHANAN'S committee next week.

BUCHANAN has been trying to identify the financial angels of the council, the Committee for Constitutional Government and the Constitutional Educational League. He has accused the three groups, all with headquarters in New York, of peddling an American brand of fascism.

DU PONTS, GRUNDY ON LIST

Here are a few of the several hundred names on the Hart list:

Union Carbide & Carbon Corp.; the Texas Co.; the Pure Oil Co.; Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce; the Sun Oil Co.; S. H. Kress & Co.; Irénée du Pont, a director of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co.; Lammot du Pont, also a director; Joseph R. Grundy, Pennsylvania Republican political boss; the William Volker Fund of Kansas City, Mo.; and Ira L. Anderson of New York City.

The period covered by the list was the 3½ years in which the Lobby Registration Act has been in effect. In this time total contributions of more than $30,000 from the Volker Fund, $25,000 from Irénée du Pont and $20,000 from Lammot du Pont were recorded. Contributions for the others could not be ascertained. Hart took in $140,000 last year.

FRIENDS OF DEMOCRACY ROLE

The Post-Dispatch obtained, however, a list of 1,600 names of individual and corporate contributors to the National Economic Council over a period generally from 1933 to 1948. This list was obtained from Dr. L. M. Birkhead, of New York, national director of Friends of Democracy, Inc., who considers it to be similar to the list given the Buchanan committee by Hart. The chief differences appear to be the inclusion of many more small contributors and a different but partly overlapping period of coverage. Some contributors are from St. Louis.

In handing his list to the committee Hart asked that it be kept confidential because if published it might be used by men and groups who, by their actions and words, have shown that they are willing to bring about the socialization and, in some cases, communization of the United States. Hart specifically mentioned Friends of Democracy, a 13-year-old anti-Fascist, anti-Communist group, and said that it had embarked on a systematic campaign to destroy the financial support of a number of organizations, including the National Economic Council.

Dr. Birkhead said his organization had been sending out letters to members of the boards of directors of corporations listed as contributing to extreme right-wing and extreme left-wing groups, including the council, and calling their attention to the background and purposes of the organizations the corporations were supporting.

Dr. Birkhead said he had received a considerable number of replies indicating many directors of corporations did not know their concerns were contributing to Hart, or if they knew it, thought that the activities of the council were somewhat different than they are. One large company is facing a minority stockholders' suit designed to recover a contribution.

According to Arnold Forester, author of A Measure of Freedom, a publication of the antidefamation league of B'nai B'rith, Hart's principal interests include lobbying against social reform and in favor of native and Spanish fascism; he devotes most of his attention to pro-Spanish propaganda work. Hart frequently has disclaimed charges of anti-Semitism.

DEFIANT LOBBIES

Such information as Congress is trying to obtain from three reactionary lobbies ought to be forthcoming as matter-of-course routine. All Chairman BUCHANAN's House committee is trying to do is to find out who is behind these groups and how much money they are contributing to kill off progressive candidates and progressive legislation.

If the Registration of Lobbying Act were adequately drawn this information would have been of record long ago. The act ought to be revised so that it will be of record, continuously. Congress has the right to know these essential facts about the groups that petition it. Otherwise how can it tell whether their petitions are to be given full faith and credence?

Knowledge of the sort is particularly essential in the case of organizations like those that are at present defying the Buchanan committee's reasonable demands for information.

One of them, the Committee for Constitutional Government, has as its head Edward A. Rumely, whose record is hardly good. Rumely was sent to prison at the time of the First World War. He was convicted of taking $1,000,000 from the German Government to buy the New York Evening Mail and convert it into a propaganda organ for Germany, according to BUCHANAN.

Another of the lobbyists, Joseph Kamp, head of the Constitutional Educational League, was fined $1,000 and sentenced to a year in prison for contempt of Congress 6 years ago, Chairman BUCHANAN reported. Merwin K. Hart, head of the third lobby in question, the National Economic Council, is the subject of a 20-page exposé in the new book, A Measure of Freedom, published by the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith.

Every lobbyist who attempts to influence Congress should be obliged to present his credentials. That is particularly so in the case of characters like Rumely, Kamp, and Hart. The financial backers of men like these should also be required to stand up and be identified. What is the reason for their prolonged and agonized reluctance to affirm their association with these lobbies? That reluctance is in itself a reason for suspicion.

We trust that the Buchanan committee will zealously continue its efforts to force these lobbies to tell where their money comes from, and that Congress will soon give the investigators the tool of a better law to work with.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to insert an editorial from the Washington Post of Monday, May 29, entitled "Disguised Propaganda" discussing this issue of lobbying by seeking to influence public opinion so that the public in turn will put pressure on Congress:

DISGUISED PROPAGANDA

In a free country many evils can be disposed of by simply bringing them into the light of day. That is the theory behind the present law on lobbying. Agents who are attempting to influence legislation are required to register and disclose their connections. It is a sound approach, but there is question as to whether the law goes far enough. Representative BUCHANAN'S Lobby Investigating Committee has given emphasis to the fact that some of the most effective lobbyists never buttonhole legislators on Capitol Hill. They stir up public sentiment which is communicated to Congress and perhaps reflected in legislation.

The Buchanan committee is now attempting to find out who supports a number of organizations of this type. It has issued subpenas designed to compel three national organizations—the Committee for Constitutional Government, the National Economic Council and the Constitutional Educational League—to disclose the sources of their funds. Leaders of the CFCG and the NEC have been tried for contempt of Congress in the past for refusing to give the names of their financial backers. We think the public has a legitimate interest in knowing how such organizations are financed and hope the committee will not only require a public accounting in these cases but will also consider the advisability of sponsoring a bill to require all similar organizations to make detailed financial reports. Only contributions of $500 or more must be identified in reports to Congress under the present lobbying act.

In this country everyone has the right to make his voice heard, but there is no right to sail under false colors. If an organization is engaged in a worthy undertaking it cannot reasonably object to having the sources of its funds known. If it is engaged in subversive activities or any kind of racket, the public interest demands that the sources of its support be laid bare. We have often pleaded for a law that would require all organizations appealing to the public for funds or carrying on propaganda activities (excepting established churches) to make a public accounting of their receipts and expenditures Useful though it may be in pointing up a principle, no committee investigation can take the place of continuous, systematic reporting of the facts. Only a statute requiring organizations to operate in the open can protect the public from being mulcted for subversive or special-interest causes and from being hoodwinked by propagandists in disguise.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to insert the background material prepared by the committee on all three of the organizations involved in the June 6 hearings:

HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE
ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES,
June 6, 1950.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

The National Economic Council, Inc., 7501 Empire State Building, New York, for 17 months after the adoption of the Federal regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946 maintained through its president, Merwin K. Hart, that it did not carry on any activities subject to that act, but it subsequently registered as a lobbying organization on January 21, 1948, "so that the council shall be free henceforth to engage in any such activity." It filed a retroactive initial financial report for the period from August 1, 1946, to December 31, 1947, and has filed quarterly reports regularly ever since.

Organized as nonprofit corporation under the membership corporation law of New York State, the NEC has as its purpose, according to Hart's own registration under the Lobbying Act "to aid in developing an informed public opinion on the major political, social, and economic problems of the Nation."

During the Eighty-first Congress, according to NEC material Hart has filed with the Clerk of the House, it said it "has been carrying on its effort before congressional committees and with individual legislators to defeat Truman program for a socialized 'welfare' state, often called 'creeping socialism'." The specific legislation which Hart and other NEC registered lobbyists have from time to time reported seeking to influence includes virtually all major foreign and domestic political issues.

FINANCIAL REPORTS

NEC has reported collecting approximately $140,000 in 1949 and spending, for purposes it believes allocable to lobbying, including some expenditures it says were "not for lobbying at all," a total of $41,967.47.

Over the entire period of its reports from August 1, 1946, to December 31, 1949, it reported total contributions and receipts from all sources amounting to $422,969.18, an average of $123,795.84 per year or $10,316.32 a month. These figures approximate the average expenditures reported by NEC during the period between August 1, 1946, and September 30, 1948, when it followed the practice of reporting all expenditures, which totaled $264,856.77 for the 26-month period or an average of $10,186.75 per month. Beginning October 1, 1948, NEC reported only that portion of its expenditures it considered allocable to lobbying, and for the 15 months to December 31, 1949, these totaled only $54,963.21 or an average of $3,664.21 per month.

HART'S SALARY

Hart's salary as president of NEC seems to have varied widely. When he registered as a lobbyist in February 1947, he stated that his salary would be "nominal," and said that "during calendar year 1946, compensation amounted to $800." For 1947, he listed salary payments totaling $6,583.31; for 1948, $6,540.84; and for 1949, $17,083.30. NEC has reported only portions of Hart's salary as an NEC lobbying expenditure and for 1949 listed allocated salary payments to Hart totaling $4,020.85.

RECEIPTS FROM SALES OF LITERATURE

NEC did not begin differentiating in its lobbying reports between contributions and its receipts from subscriptions or sales of literature until it filed for the fourth quarter of 1948, when it first listed separately its receipts other than contributions. From October 1, 1948, through December 31, 1949, it reported receipts from subscriptions and sales of literature totaling $72,786.92, as against contributions during that same period of $83,222.18. In three of the five calendar quarters involved, "other receipts" were greater than all contributions reported.

LARGE CONTRIBUTORS

Forty corporations or business concerns, 24 individuals, a charities fund and a cancer and blood research foundation are listed in NEC quarterly reports as having made a total of 104 contributions of $500 or more between August 1, 1946, and December 31, 1949. The amounts of these individual contributions were not given; they appear to have averaged about $1,000 each, however, according to total figures which were submitted.

Multiple contributors of $500 or more, and the number of such contributions each, included: Empire State, Inc., New York (8); Gulf Oil Corp., Pittsburgh (5); Lone Star Cement Corp., New York (5); Texas Co., New York (3); Mohawk Carpet Mills, Amsterdam, N. Y. (3); Pure Oil Co., Chicago (3); William Volker & Co., Kansas City, Mo. (2); Union Carbide & Carbon Co., New York (2); Tobin Packing Co., Rochester, N. Y. (2); Armco Steel Corp., Middletown, Ohio (2); C. M. Funk, 114 Fifth Avenue, New York (4); C. S. Payson, 30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York (4); John J. Raskob, 350 Fifth Avenue, New York (3); Irénée du Pont, Wilmington, Del. (3); Lammot du Pont, Wilmington, Del. (2); William Volker Charities Fund, Kansas City, Kans. (2).

Other contributors of $500 or more reported by NEC: Public Health Foundation for Cancer and Blood Research, 1 Atlantic Street, Stamford, Conn.; S. H. Kress & Co., New York; Vick Chemical Co., New York; Monsanto Chemical Co., St. Louis; John S. Kemper Co., Chicago; Harnischfeger Corp., Milwaukee; Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago; McCrory Stores, New York; Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., Topeka, Kans.; Brewing Corp. of America, Cleveland; Acme Steel Co., Chicago; Sharon Steel Corp., Sharon, Pa.; Carter Carburetor Corp., St. Louis; Air Maze Corp., Cleveland; Standard Railway Equipment Mfg. Co., Chicago; Pressed Steel Tank Co., Milwaukee; Stockham Pipe Fittings, Birmingham, Ala.; Eddy Paper Corp., Chicago; Pittston Co., Hoboken, N. J.; Alabama Mills, Birmingham; Perfection Stove Co., Cleveland; Chapel Hill Gas System, Dallas, Tex.; Rock-Ledge Institute, South Norwalk, Conn.; Beech Air Craft, Wichita, Kans.; American Cyanamid Co., New York; S. M. Swenson & Sons, 52 Wall Street, New York; Bucyrus Erie Co., South Milwaukee, Wis.; J. I. Case Co., Racine, Wis., S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc., Racine, Wis.; Joseph Schlitz Brewing Co., Milwaukee; Crampton & Knowles Loom Works, Worcester, Mass.; Miss Ella Mable Clark, 831 Madison Avenue, New York; John W. Blodgett, Jr., Public Service Building, Portland, Oreg.; W. Tip Davis, box 2495, Honolulu, T. H.; Walter Regnery, care of Western Shade Cloth Co., Chicago; Dr. S. A. Brown, 75 East Fifty-fifth Street, New York; George E. Warren, 120 Broadway, New York; Ira L. Anderson, American Provident Society, 60 Beaver Street, New York; George Vidal, 925 South Homan Avenue, Chicago; Mrs. Albert T. Leatherbee, 42 Rockview Street, Jamaica Plain, Mass.; R. E. Wood, 925 South Homan Avenue, Chicago; Albert W. Hawkes, Belgrove Avenue, Kearney, N. J., Godfrey L. Cabot, 77 Franklin Street, Boston; N. E. Nelson, Sears, Roebuck & Co., Chicago; Mrs. M. K. Hart, Winship Road, New Hartford, N. Y.; G. S. Anderson, 925 South Homan Avenue, Chicago; Ralph P. Mershon, 2000 Tiger Trail Avenue, Miami; E. G. Howes, 321 Summer Street, Boston; W. H. Regnery, Joanna Western Mills Co., Chicago.

HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITY,
June 6, 1950.

CONSTITUTIONAL EDUCATIONAL LEAGUE

The Constitutional Educational League, Inc., of 342 Madison Avenue, New York, a pamphleteering and propaganda mill seeking contributions to help it circulate material stressing imminent dangers to the American way of life in various legislative proposals, has never filed under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946, nor has any agent or employee of CEL registered under this act. Reticence about the financial affairs of the organization has been characteristic of CEL and of its executive vice chairman, Joseph P. Kamp.

Kamp, who refused a request to turn over to the House Select Committee on Lobbying Activities information on the receipts of CEL, and was thereupon subpenaed to produce this information, meanwhile is under sentence and awaiting commitment to a 4-month jail term for similarly defying a House Elections Expenditures Committee in 1944. He was tried and convicted in 1948 on charges of contempt of Congress growing out of that 1944 refusal. His appeal was denied by the circuit court late in 1948, and the Supreme Court last month refused to review the case.

CEL propaganda material coming to Members of Congress ranges over a variety of subjects but usually centers on one theme, the danger of communism abroad and particularly at home. The latest publication, America Betrayed, which CEL offers for 50 cents per copy, alleges "treason, conspiracy, skulduggery, misconduct and mismanagement in our own State Department" in connection with the Chinese situation, and claims to name more than 100 Reds in the State Department.

Another 50-cent booklet is represented as exposing Communist and Socialist infiltration in the YWCA. A 25-cent pamphlet alleged Red bias in the steel fact-finding board. A $1 pamphlet discusses the hidden facts behind the crusade for world government.

CEL booklets carry an order sheet for ordering bulk lots of publications ranging from the 1-cent-per-copy Penny Pamphlet Series to a $5 Special Dossier of Patriotic Literature said to include more than 50 selections.

Contributions are invited in support of the league's educational program and to assist in giving wider circulation to its literature.

HOUSE SELECT COMMITTEE ON LOBBYING ACTIVITIES,
May 26, 1950.

COMMITTEE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

The Committee for Constitutional Government and its guiding genius, Edward A. Rumely, must be of particular interest to any congressional investigation of propaganda groups and reports required by law to be filed by such groups. Rumely, executive secretary of CFCG, is very experienced in the matter of false and misleading reports and concealing records.

After World War I, Rumely was convicted of violating the Trading With the Enemy Act which required that any person indebted to an enemy should report that fact to the Alien Property Custodian. Rumely was found guilty of making false and misleading reports to the Alien Property Custodian in order to conceal an indebtedness to the German government of more than $1,000,000. The indebtedness had been incurred in connection with Rumely's purchase, in 1915, of the New York Evening Mail in order to convert that newspaper into a German propaganda organ. President Coolidge pardoned Rumely after he had served only 30 days of his sentence.

Rumely entered upon his present position, executive secretary of CFCG, in the early 1930's. In March 1938, Rumely and Sumner Gerard, also employed by CFCG, were called by the Special Senate Committee to Investigate Lobbying Activities. They refused to produce records demanded by the committee, but the committee failed to cite them for contempt.

In 1944, the Special Committee of the House of Representatives to Investigate Campaign Expenditures subpenaed Rumely, in an endeavor to obtain records of CFCG's activities in the 1944 campaign. Rumely appeared on September 25, 1944, refused to produce the records, and was cited for contempt. On October 13, 1945, a trial on this charge ended in a mistrial when the jury failed to agree on a verdict. Rumely was acquitted on retrial, April 18, 1946.

CFCG is one of the heaviest-spending lobbies on record. Its filings under section 305 of the act set out expenditures of $1,571,240.72 for the 38 months that the act has been in effect. This is an average of over $40,000 per month, and approximately one-half million dollars per year. But CFCG has steadfastly refused to disclose the names of its contributors. Both of its previous brushes with congressional committees have been on this same subject and the committee and its officers have indicated a willingness to undergo contempt proceedings rather than reveal this information.

The refusal to disclose the names of contributors under the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act can best be understood if the facts are considered in chronological order:

(1) This organization was among the first to comply with section 305, filing its first quarterly report on October 7, 1946 (Form A–7, October 7, 1946). The first question on Form A asks the respondent to list the names and addresses of all persons who have made contributions of $500 or more during the preceding quarter, and since the effective date of the act. CFCG's response was "None." The second entry on Form A should include the total of all other contributions of less than $500. CFCG's reply was "None." Item 3 asks for the total of all contributions, including those reported in previous statements. Again, the response was "None."

On the expenditure side, this procedure was reversed. Question (4) requires the name and address of every person to whom more than $10 has been disbursed, along with the amount, date, and purpose of such expenditure. Here the return carefully itemized expenses, largely for books and printing, to the total of $97,744.45. Under the fifth entry, which requires only the aggregate sum of all expenditures under $10, the return details individual disbursements totaling $64.57.

(2) In the next five quarterly reports the same pattern was followed (Forms A–95, January 9, 1947; A–223, April 9, 1947; A–401, July 8, 1947; A–503, October 8, 1947; A–691, January 9, 1948). No contributions of any kind were reported, but all expenditures, whether smaller or larger than $10, were carefully itemized. From their reports, it would appear the CFCG had spent $677,483.50 in 1946 and 1947, but that it had not received any contributions at all.

(3) Finally, on April 6, 1948, CFCG filed a report in which it indicated that it had received $197,675.17 from 10,396 individual contributors during 1947 (Form A–868, April 6, 1948). The total was broken down into numbers of contributors in each of several categories; under $10, $11–$25, $26–$50, $51–$100, and $101–$490. The number of contributors and the aggregate of their contributions were computed for each category. No contributions larger than $500 were reported, however. As a consequence, CFCG did not disclose the identity of any of its contributors. Subsequent reports have been filed by CFCG, and they have included statements of contributions. But none of these reported contributions exceeded $490, and only aggregate figures were listed (Forms A–940, April 10, 1948, and A–1169, July 8, 1948).

For the first year and one-half of the Lobbying Act's operation, CFCG failed to render fully and completely the information required under section 305. The key to the CFCG's more recent disclosure of contributions can be found in the following remarkable letter addressed to the Clerk of the House by Mr. Sumner Gerard, treasurer of CFCG:

"Recently, at the request of T. Vincent Quinn, Acting Attorney General [sic], representatives of the FBI called upon us to ask for further information with reference to Form A which we file under the Lobbying Act.

"On Form A, we misunderstood the second question as referring to amounts received and reported upon as $500 or more. However, from the information given us, we now understand that in the second question information is to be supplied as to all contributions of $490 and less, and other income. * * *

"We are glad to supply this, as we publish the data on income. It was a misunderstanding of what was desired under the question." (Attached to Form A–868.)

Some of the information submitted by CFCG along with its letter of April 6, 1948, is highly revealing. It indicated the following details as to receipts:

Period from Aug. 2, 1946, to Dec. 31, 1946:
Contributions of 10 cents to $490	$293,593.98
Cash sales of book and literature	247,437.39
Loans from officers and friends	16,150.000
Period from Jan. 1, 1947, to Dec. 31, 1947:
Contributions of 10 cents to $490	197,675.17
Sales of books and literature	219,437.39

Cash sales of books and literature amounted to one-quarter of a million dollars in 1946, and to more than $200,000 in 1947. In 1947, more income was received by the CFCG in this fashion than was received from contributions reported under the Lobbying Act.

Subsequent reports for 1948 and 1949 filed by CFCG under section 305 show the following breakdowns of contributions and money received from the sales of books and literature:

Year	Quarter	Contributions	Books
1948	1	(1)	(1)
1948	2	$29,808.82	$74,845.60
1948	3	39,996.96	59,881.06
1948	4	56,047.85	53,062.58
1949	1	64,481.42	91,281.23
1949	2	51,822.43	98,538.14
1949	3	45,291.72	67,739.83
Total		287,449.20	445,348.44

[1] $134,757.65 lumped together.

Totals for the entire period from August 1946 to the end of the third quarter of 1949:

Receipts from contributions---- $778,718.35
Receipts from sale of books---- 911,867.38

The CFCG has received more money from the sale of books than from contributions. Moreover, the quarter-by-quarter figures indicate that receipts from books constitute an increasingly large proportion of the committee's income.

Mr. Speaker, a final word on the reasonableness of our request for information from these three groups. I can best discuss this by citing some of our previous procedures.

On April 25 when a representative of the CIO Housing Committee appeared before us I asked him to identify the source of the funds used to finance the lobbying operations of that committee. He agreed to do so—page 689 of the stenographic transcript. Congressman HALLECK asked him to identify the persons who pay for the issuance of its pamphlets and booklets—page 690. Congressman BROWN asked him to furnish the amounts spent in publishing these booklets, the amounts received from the sale of the booklets, and the purchasers of the booklets—pages 701–702. That information is being prepared for the committee.

On May 3 when a representative for the National Housing Conference, Inc., appeared before us, both Congressman BROWN and I asked him to identify not merely those who make sizable contributions to the organization, but the names of all of those who belong to it and Congressman BROWN further asked that every public official included in that list be so identified. A membership for the National Housing Conference, Inc., costs, as I recall, $5 per year. At most it is $15. So while we are asking for the names of those who have contributed as much as $1,000 in 3½ years to the Committee for Constitutional Government or the Constitutional Educational League, either as direct contributions or for the purchase of propaganda material in bulk orders, and meeting defiance on this request on the grounds that it is unreasonable or unconstitutional, we had no hesitation about asking for the name of everyone who gives as little as $5 to an organization promoting public-housing legislation and no one on our committee expressed any thought that this was in any way unreasonable. Those names have been supplied.

Another organization involved in the technique of mass pamphleteering and receiving very sizable contributions from large corporations in the form of bulk purchases of this material on legislative issues has given us full information concerning both its contributors and the large purchasers of its publications. I will not say that this organization, a so-called educational foundation, was particularly delighted to turn this information over to us, with the prospect that it might be made public, but the fact is that it did turn it over in a spirit of cooperation and did not seek to hide behind any legalistic arguments.

Thus it can be seen, Mr. Speaker, that we have not met, generally, with the kind of obstructionism and concealment reflected in the attitude of the Committee for Constitutional Government and of this man Kamp who is on his way to jail, who prefers jail to identifying to a congressional committee the sources of funds spent, not only for lobbying purchases, but also to my mind for disguised political purposes.

Numerous organizations have demonstrated to us that insofar as they are concerned no stigma should attach to any group merely because it acknowledges engaging in lobbying activities. They have been frank and forthright and aboveboard. They believe in certain causes, legislative causes, and they solicit and expend money for the purpose of influencing Congress directly and indirectly as well.

Mr. Speaker, that kind of a lobbyist and that kind of lobbying organization is the kind I can salute, the kind I can compliment for participating in American democracy, for showing their true colors and true affiliations and their beliefs, by showing that they believe in these causes not only in their hearts but with their purses. If the stigma is to be removed from lobbying—and I hope to see it removed—then it is the respectable, aboveboard, out-in-the-open lobbying groups of this caliber which will have done much toward achieving that goal.

[From the Washington Post of June 13, 1950]

INDIRECT LOBBYING

The Lobby Investigating Committee has begun a fruitful inquiry into the activities of corporations designed to influence legislation. Questionnaires have gone out to 166 large corporations asking for data on travel expenses of their representatives to and from Washington, maintenance of Washington offices, contributions to lobbying organizations and so forth. Apparently the committee is trying to get a comprehensive view of how big corporations operate behind the scenes to secure favorable legislation and to head off bills regarded as inimical to their interests. In many instances indirect lobbying of this sort may be more important than the work of registered lobbyists on Capitol Hill.

On the basis of its findings the committee will consider whether the present Lobbying Act should be extended to cover the activities of business concerns intended to influence public opinion. We suspect that there will be strong support for a general proposal of that sort. This newspaper has consistently urged that the people have a right to know the sources of funds spent to influence public opinion. Of course, that principle applies as strongly to other concerns as to business groups engaged in lobbying. Certainly the problem is not limited to business corporations. Democratic principles demand that any regulation of indirect lobbying be also applied to labor unions and propaganda associations whether or not they are corporations in legal form.

Indeed, the propagandizing under false colors about which the public is most concerned these days is that perpetrated by the Communists and their fellow travelers. The crocodile tears shed by the Communists over liberal causes and their duplicity in collecting funds for such causes and using them to broadcast lies from Moscow would be readily exposed by a law requiring detailed financial reports from all organizations seeking to influence public opinion. To limit the regulation of indirect lobbying to business concerns would be to ignore the most pressing need for legislation in this field.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal of June 11, 1950]

CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATORS UNEARTH A GIGANTIC, DANGEROUS SUPERLOBBY—BUT FULL EXPOSURE OF THE COMMITTEE FOR CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IS GOING TO BE VERY DIFFICULT—RICH AND POWERFUL, IT CLEARLY HAS THE BACKING OF RICH AND POWERFUL MEN AND ORGANIZATIONS—IT STRESSES OUTWARD PATRIOTISM AND OPPOSES EVERYTHING THAT IS IN THE LEAST PROGRESSIVE—ITS OPERATIONS ARE FAR-FLUNG, AND IT PUTS OUT PUBLICATIONS BY THE MILLIONS OF COPIES

(By John F. Day)

WASHINGTON, June 10.—The Special House Committee on Lobbying has got its teeth into something big and potentially dangerous to the country.

The something is a superlobby, probably the superlobby. Its head, or correlating agency, is called the Committee for Constitutional Government. That organization's head, in turn, is benign-looking, pious-speaking, rightist-thinking Dr. Edward A. Rumely, a one-time medical practitioner.

Chairman BUCHANAN, Democrat, Pennsylvania, says, "This is it." He means that the disclosure of the operations and machinations of this lobby will constitute the major result of a probe which started last year into all manner of organizations seeking to bring pressure on Congress.

IT'LL BE TOUGH

Full exposure of this lobby, however, is going to be extremely difficult. It wraps itself in the flag and the Constitution. It cries out for free enterprise and against encroaching socialism. It is rich and powerful because it has rich and powerful men and companies behind it. Rumely and his associates are clever. Like Communists, they spawn new organizations. Like Communists, they seek to cover up their backers and the full scope of their operations. Like Communists, they use every legal technicality to fight back.

Further, this lobby, which represents itself as engaged in purely educational work, has many followers in Congress, especially among Republicans. One of them, CLARE HOFFMAN, of Michigan, this week introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the investigators.

And Rumely already has started the legal fight. He filed in Federal district court here a request for an injunction to stop the lobby investigators from compelling disclosure of the data sought about the organization's financial backers.

The lobby committee will meet next week in executive session to decide whether to bring contempt proceedings against Rumely for refusing to produce the records subpenaed. BUCHANAN will recommend such action against Rumely and Joseph P. Kamp, of the Constitutional Educational League, who also defied the subpena.

Chances are the two will be cited. BUCHANAN has the other three Democrats with him; and he may have, although it appears improbable, the vote of one or more of the three Republicans.

But that will be only the beginning, insofar as Rumely and Kamp are concerned.

They will fight all the way to the Supreme Court, as they have done before. The two defied a House committee investigating campaign expenditures in 1944. In Rumely's case, a jury couldn't agree in 1945, and he was acquitted on a retrial in 1946. Kamp was convicted and given a 4-month jail sentence, and the Supreme Court recently upheld that conviction. He is out now while petitioning the High Court for a rehearing.

In 1920, Rumely was convicted of having used German money in carrying on propaganda activities in violation of the Trading With the Enemy Act. He carried that case to the Supreme Court and lost. But President Coolidge pardoned him after he had served only 30 days of a 2-year sentence.

Probably because of Rumely's past record, his name does not appear on the letterhead or office doors of the Committee for Constitutional Government. Yet he is its executive secretary, its brain. The chairman is Dr. Willford I. King, an expert pamphleteer, and the treasurer is Sumner Gerard, formerly Rumely's secretary. Most of the press releases go out under Gerard's name. The biweekly news letters, called Paul Revere messages, are signed by King.

GANNETT WAS FOUNDER

Part of CCG's appeal lies in the fact it was organized for what most people would consider a good purpose. It was founded in 1937 by Frank Gannett, publisher of 21 New York State newspapers, to fight President Roosevelt's proposal to expand membership of the Supreme Court. But after helping to defeat that Court-packing scheme, Gannett and his associates were so happy over what they called mail-order government that they carried it on to combat everything that could in any manner be termed progressive.

Gannett does not take as active part in CCG as he once did. But he is still one of its directors, he undoubtedly still contributes considerable money to it, and he is supporting Rumely in his defiance of the lobby committee. He has written that the Buchanan committee has "gone far out of bounds in considering the CCG's sale of books as coming under the Lobbying Act," and that he believes "the Constitution protects the right to privacy in such matters."

Gannett and Rumely are on exceptionally friendly terms, so friendly that Rumely has said that Gannett will provide for him in his will.

CCG'S DEFINITIONS

Perhaps the great source of strength of the CCG is the subtle and innocuous-appearing approach it makes. It is educational, it says, seeking only to protect the American way of life. It distributes such standard references as Norton's The Constitution of the United States. Who can object to that? It is anti-Communist. Most Americans are. It makes varied appeals in its publications to people who are not reactionary, or even very conservative.

But most of its publications are merely come-ons accepted by millions of people who haven't the faintest idea who is behind the Committee for Constitutional Government, or what their real aims are.

What is their definition of free enterprise and the American way of life? The Lobby Committee has evidence that their idea of free enterprise is wholly unrestricted big business, where the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. It has evidence that the American way of life to them means rule by Strong Men, with a capital S, capital M; that they believe the little people aren't capable of governing themselves. They, of course, are careful to denounce Hitler and Mussolini now and then, but they want leaders of this pattern. One of Rumely's old slogans is "Send strong men to Congress." Sounds all right. But "strong men" is significantly a favorite term.

WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, is certainly no wild-eyed radical in anybody's book. And here's what he said on the floor of the House this week:

"Fascism is a real threat in this country. I consider the Committee for Constitutional Government the spearhead of fascism in this country. * * * That group is the most dangerous group in our country. I will admit that we should continue the fight against communism, always be on the alert against communism. But at the same time let us remain alert against the forces that would throw this country into fascism.

"The way the Fascists work, they want to destroy the confidence the people have in their leaders. * * * This organization is doing more in that direction than any other organization in America. * * * During the war we had Axis Sally in Berlin on the radio trying to cause our soldiers to turn against the United States Government. * * * Today, in peacetime, we have a lot of male Axis Sallys trying to cause the American people to distrust their Government."

PATMAN is not a member of the Lobby Committee.

The CCG is for lower taxes. That's a good appeal. Who isn't? But the CCG has advanced, or has in the planning stage, some remarkable ideas. The men who run it would limit Federal taxes to 15 percent of the national income. If that were done, tax revenues would pay for our Military Establishment, veterans' benefits, interest on the national debt—and very little more. There wouldn't be enough to run the Government on, much less to start retiring the debt.

The CCG would like to do away with all income taxes. But recognizing that is impractical, it has proposed that income taxes be limited to 25 percent, no matter how great the income. One can appreciate the appeal that makes to the rich and to some of the big corporations.

When asking for income-tax reductions it asks for across-the-board cuts—the same rate of reduction for everybody. It has actually toyed with the idea of a flat income-tax rate. In other words, if the rate were 20 percent, the man making $5,000 would get to keep $4,000. The man making $100,000 would get to keep $80,000. That's fair, isn't it?

LEADERS CONSISTENT

The CCG wants to see labor controlled. A lot of people can agree that labor has acted mighty high-handed, and in many instances has gone too far. But do they want to destroy collective bargaining? Do they want to go along with one of the CCG's pieces of literature called Labor Monopolies or Freedom? It says:

"We must not be defeatists. We must not say collective bargaining is here to stay and there is nothing we can do about it. The public has been taught that collective bargaining is beneficial. We must learn through discussion, debate, experience, that it is harmful."

Leaders of the CCG are consistent. No "me-tooism" here. They are against everything, save possibly the Constitution—and they would like to see it amended to suit their own purposes. They are against the New Deal, the Fair Deal, and any other deal except their own, absolutely and in toto, foreign or domestic.

They oppose social security, national health insurance, Federal aid to education (and, in fact, all grants-in-aid), public housing, rent control, public power projects, maintenance of farm prices, veterans' pensions, the foreign-aid program, etc., etc.

All these things, they say, are taking America down the road to socialism.

Supporting the same type of an anti program are Kamp's Constitutional Educational League and Merwin K. Hart's National Economic Council. (Hart was a bit more cooperative this week than Rumely and Kamp. He produced his records in compliance with a subpena.) But CCG doesn't find many other lobby groups who are interested in defeating everything. So it supports various ones on various projects.

For example, it is with the American Medical Association in fighting socialized medicine, with the National Association of Manufacturers in fighting labor, with the National Association of Real Estate Boards in fighting public housing and rent control, and so forth.

Yet the CCG contends it is not political, because it does not indorse candidates. Says Rumely, "We deal with issues, not men." That could hardly be called even a half-truth. It doesn't name candidates it supports. But it throws its weight in the direction of those most likely to support its issues.

SOURCES UNDISCLOSED

It sent publications by the millions into Florida and North Carolina during the recent primaries. Who paid for them? That's something the Lobby Committee wants to find out.

Chairman BUCHANAN feels that the CCG is the perfect example of the new-type lobby he wants to put a spotlight on. It doesn't engage in buttonholing Congressmen. It just swamps them with "educational literature." But its principal modus operandi is to propagandize the people back home and to get them to bring pressure on their Congressmen. It is a grass-roots campaign, operating on the idea that the swaying of a relatively small number of people can create a voting bloc large enough to tip the scales at the bar of public opinion.

BUCHANAN realizes, of course, that every American has the right to try to sell his ideas. What he is trying to show is the vast scope of such operations, the pretense of being one thing while actually being another, the cover-up of financial backing.

CCG has listed $1,571,240 in expenditures during the 38 months the Lobbying Act has been in effect. But it has never disclosed the sources of its income, except to list totals from donations and totals from sales of books and pamphlets. The lobby law requires the listing of donors of $500 or more. So the CCG asks for contributions of $490; and if anybody sends in $500 he gets $10 back. Further, the CCG operates as a charitable organization, so a donor can claim an income-tax deduction.

The organization has in New York a mailing room as long as a football field. From there, it sends out its material by the millions of pieces, by the tons, by the railroad carloads.

It has a very clever arrangement with 8 or 10 Members of Congress. It gets them, through a speech or extension of remarks, to put some of its propaganda in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Then these Congressmen order reprints from the Government Printing Office at a lower printing cost than could otherwise be obtained. The Congressmen pay for these reprints, and are reimbursed by CCG. The Congressmen put these reprints in their free-franked envelopes and send them by the sackful to New York. There the CCG makes use of its incredible mailing lists, postage-free.

"EDUCATED IGNORANT"

Not long ago a corridor in the House Office Building was stacked to the ceiling with bags carrying such material under the frank of Representative GWINN, Republican, New York. Another who has taken part in the operation is Representative HOFFMAN, who wants the investigators investigated.

The CCG aims at business and professional people. To use a term employed recently by the magazine The Reporter, the appeal of much of its material is to the "educated ignorant." For example:

The CCG has taken over John T. Flynn's The Road Ahead, and is trying to make it to the CCG cause what Uncle Tom's Cabin was to the antislavery cause. It has published a paper-bound edition which also contains such edifying material as Socialism—American Variety, by Congressman GWINN, and the Fair Deal and the Eighth Commandment, by Dr. King. Total sales are now approaching the million mark, and there have been many big-lot sales. The committee wants to know who bought these books in large quantities for redistribution; and Rumely has defied the committee to find out.

LIST SUBMITTED

Anyone who isn't completely prejudiced or politically naive can dissect into little bits this book by the former America First leader. Flynn writes luridly and categorically. He takes truth and halftruths, fills them full of air and lets the wind carry them where it will.

But a doctor who hasn't read anything but a medical book since he read Horatio Alger or the Rover Boys might be scared to death by it. At least, that's the CCG's hope, and apparently a very sound one.

The Committee for Constitutional Government, the Constitutional Educational League and the National Economic Council follow the same line, use the same methods, get their money from some of the same sources. Each denies it is affiliated with the other. Whether the Lobby Committee can prove they are linked remains to be seen.

Committee investigators who spent 2 weeks in the CCG offices say correspondence indicates the "big names" who support the organization know what they're doing, but that many of the "little names' apparently are dupes.

Hart turned over to the committee this week, in answer to subpena, a list of about 300 of the biggest contributors to the National Economic Council. That list hasn't been made public, but here are some of the names that are on it: Union Carbide and Carbon, the Texas Co., Pure Oil Co., Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, Sun Oil Co., S. H. Kress and Co., Irenee du Pont and Lammot du Pont (directors of E. I. du Pont de Nemours, Inc.), Joseph R. Grundy (recently deposed Republican boss in Pennsylvania), the William Volker Fund of Kansas City.

During the 3½ years of the lobby law, about $30,000 has gone to the organization from the Volker Fund, and $45,000 from the du Ponts.

The following names may or may not be on the list given the committee, but they were included in another authentic list of contributors: Armco, Sears, Roebuck & Co., Bethlehem Steel, Chamber of Commerce of Honolulu, Eastman Kodak, Victor Emanuel of the Avco Manufacturing Co., Empire State, Inc., of New York, Greyhound Corp. of Chicago, Gulf Oil, Congressman GWINN, International Business Machines, McCrory Stores, Gen. Douglas MacArthur (only a $10 gift noted), Monsanto Chemical Co., Remington-Rand, Vick Chemical Co.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN]. It seems to me it has been universally admitted by friends and foes alike that the conduct of the special committee of which he has been chairman has been eminently fair to everybody concerned and in all respects.

It strikes me that perhaps the inquiries being developed are beginning to reach real pay dirt, and it can be expected that there are some organizations and individuals who would object to having their activities and expenditures, in attempting to influence legislation, brought to light.

I am confident that when the committee makes its report, it will receive the plaudits of the vast majority of the American public, including the businessmen of the country.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HOEVEN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

BRANNAN PLAN REPUDIATED IN IOWA PRIMARY

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, before the polls were closed and the ballots counted in the recent Iowa primaries the Fair Deal administration rushed into print and on the air with claims of victory for the Brannan plan. This was a perfect example of the reckless propaganda technique of the entrenched bureaucrats.

On the basis of complete returns from the Iowa primaries it is now apparent to everyone that the Brannan plan was definitely repudiated by the farmers of Iowa.

Albert J. Loveland, the plumed knight who entered the lists as champion of the Brannan program, would have been sunk without a trace if it had not been for the support he received in some of the larger cities of Iowa with heavy labor votes.

The Truman-Brannan candidate, Mr. Loveland, actually received only approximately 10 percent of the total vote cast for senatorial candidates in the June 5 primaries, although he got enough to win the nomination. Under the Iowa law, he was required to receive 35 percent of his own party's vote to be nominated. He actually received 37.7 percent of the Democratic vote, not a majority of all the vote. A large part of that plurality was a city vote and not rural.

In the Democratic primary there were six candidates—Albert J. Loveland, who endorsed the Brannan plan; former Gov. Nelson G. Kraschel, who opposed it vigorously; former Congressman Otha Wearin, who rapped the Brannan plan but not too vigorously; Myer and Shaw, who early favored the Brannan plan but later reversed themselves; and Seemann, who did not campaign. The unofficial votes were as follows:

Loveland	37,928
Kraschel	31,842
Wearin	11,897
Myer	9,352
Seemann	4,804
Shaw	4,546

It will be noted that the Kraschel and Wearin vote together was considerably greater than that received by Loveland.

There was a total vote in the Democratic senatorial race of 100,369 while the total vote for both the Democratic and Republican candidates was 358,400. Mr. Loveland carried 60 counties in the Democratic primary out of the 99 counties in Iowa while 39 counties were carried by his five Democratic opponents.

The total vote received by Mr. Loveland was 37,928 as above set out while his closest rival, Kraschel, received 31,842, giving Mr. Loveland a margin of only 6,086. So without considering the Wearin vote, it can be fairly stated that the Brannan-plan advocates only won by the small margin of 6,086 votes. The man sent out from Washington to tell Iowans what kind of a farm program they should have, got 37,928 votes out of a total of approximately 358,400 votes cast in the primary by both political parties.

It is interesting to note where a large part of the Loveland vote came from. In checking the 20 counties in Iowa containing the 20 largest cities in the State—all over 10,000—we find that Mr. Loveland received approximately 17,758 votes in those 20 counties. In the 40 other counties he carried, all of them being rural, Loveland only received approximately 20,170 votes, or an average of approximately 500 votes in each of the rural counties he carried. On the other hand, Senator HICKENLOOPER, one of the Republican candidates for the Senate, carried all of the 99 counties in Iowa with a total vote of 190,863. He had more votes than his two Republican opponents and all six of the Democratic candidates put together. Senator HICKENLOOPER was opposed to the Brannan plan, as was Mr. Kraschel. Their vote added together totals 222,705, as compared with the insignificant total of 37,928 received by Mr. Loveland, the Brannan candidate. Under no stretch of the imagination can it therefore be seriously contended that the people of Iowa endorsed the Brannan plan in the recent primary.

The labor unions of Iowa are taking credit for the Loveland nomination and rightly so. Mr. Loveland received about half of his total vote in the 20 counties heretofore mentioned in which a large part of the labor vote in Iowa is concentrated. During the primary campaign, Loveland had the endorsement of the Farmers Union and the CIO and also received strong support from the railroad brotherhoods, the A. F. of L., and the independent unions. The strong support for Loveland by labor is indicated by the fact that in Blackhawk, Cerro Gordo, Linn, Polk, Wapello, Webster, and Woodbury Counties in which large labor votes are concentrated, Loveland gained a margin of 5,430 votes over Kraschel. Loveland's plurality over Kraschel being only 6,086 votes for the entire State, therefore clearly indicates that practically this entire vote came from the 7 strong labor counties above mentioned, and that approximately only 656 votes of the 6,086 plurality came from the other 92 counties of Iowa, which are predominantly rural.

The primary contest in Iowa on June 5 was a preliminary test for the Brannan plan. The results of the primary clearly show that the Brannan plan was overwhelmingly repudiated not only by the people of Iowa as a whole but by the farmers of Iowa in particular.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEVEN. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I am very much interested in what the gentleman is saying. I wonder if the candidates he spoke of as supporting the Brannan plan have been able to explain the plan to the people? Did they mention the 17 pages of penalties imposed upon the farmers, and were they able to give any idea of how much the plan would cost?

Mr. HOEVEN. As far as I know, those matters were not emphasized at all. Nothing was said about the cost or the penalties. They did circulate an illustrated pamphlet entitled "The Administration Farm Program—What There Is in It for You?"

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Eighty-three pages were in the Senate version of the bill and it has been very difficult to find out a detailed explanation of it. As I recall, of the 83 pages, 17 of them were penalties imposed upon the farmer if he did not do what he was told to do.

Mr. HOEVEN. To my knowledge, no reference was made in the campaign to the 17 pages of penalties involved. The farmers were to find that out later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MANSFIELD). The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

(Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks, and to revise and extend the remarks he made during the address by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN].)

COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, my interest in the activities of the Committee to Investigate Lobbying grew out of the fact that it seemed to me from the list to which the questionnaire was sent, and from the activities of members of the staff, that once again the Communists, the Reds and the Pinks, the New Dealers, and people who think that all of those who believe in constitutional government have a little disloyalty in their make-up, were starting their campaign of abuse and vilification in an effort to silence them.

Mr. CROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CROOK. Are you classifying New Dealers with the Reds and the Pinks?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Certainly not, and the gentleman should know very well that I am not. I mentioned various groups. We have the Communists. We have the Reds, the Pinks, then we have the people who think that the New Deal and the policies which it advocates came straight down from the Almighty. I do not agree with that. I am not in any way intimating, and I never did, that the New Dealers were Pink or Red.

Mr. CROOK. You put the New Dealers in the same classification when you enumerated them.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, no; I do not do any such thing. The New Dealers are just another group which is intolerant of criticism. There is an example, Mr. Speaker, of some people, who insist that everyone who disagrees with them must be disloyal and must be trying to misstate the views of others. I have no criticism of the gentleman, of his party, nor of anyone in this House. Everyone has a right to think and believe what he wishes, and to say what he wants, but when you try to intimidate a person just because he does not agree with you, then you are going entirely too far.

Mr. CROOK. I am not trying to intimidate, but I do not want to plaster the New Deal with a Pink spread.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Nor do I. The New Dealers will not give others the consideration they demand for themselves. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I just wanted to know if the gentleman has ever heard any accusation of Red being made against the Republicans, or whether they had supported any Red thinking.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I never heard of any real Republican being accused of Red views. We have been accused of being reactionary—back numbers. But I do not want to go into that.

I want to say here that I remember very distinctly seeing Communists up before the Dies committee in the company of New Dealers. That does not mean, by any means, that all of the New Dealers were in sympathy at all with the Communists, because I know many and many a one who believed sincerely in Americanism.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Not now.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I just want to ask one little question.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes; I know. Listen. A little question. I want to say to the gentleman that I recognize his great ability. It is regrettable——

Mr. EBERHARTER. Well——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I recognize his great ability; I will stop there and let it go at that. I remember the attacks the gentleman made against the Dies committee.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield for a question only, and not for a long one either.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Does the gentleman believe in the theory of guilt by association?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No; that is an idea with which I have no sympathy. Just because a man joins or belongs to an organization, it does not follow that he accepts all the teachings of that organization. Were the contrary true, joining the church would be an easy way of becoming a Christian. But birds of a feather flock together is an old saying with some truth in it, and if you hang around the grog shop all the time, if you take a drink from the end of a bottle too often, your neighbors may well say that you favor strong drink.

Mr. EBERHARTER. The gentleman states that he believes in the theory that birds of a feather flock together. You have Republicans and Democrats flocking together here, do you not?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, nonsense. You cannot say we flock together when we violently disagree in political theory, in thought.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Birds of a feather on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Nonsense.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Hawks on your side; pigeons on the other. You have a degree from a law school. Why do you waste your time and breath in talk like that?

The thing that is troubling me is to learn what constitutes lobbying within the meaning of the act creating the lobbying committee.

It has been the belief of many of us for some time at least that lobbying was a specialized activity, that a lobbyist was one who advocated the passage or the rejection of legislation, one who engaged in persuasion for hire—the purpose being to influence legislation.

Now it seems that lobbying—at least I gather that the committee accepts this view—that a man is a lobbyist if he attempts to influence legislation, no matter what purpose motivates him. Am I right? I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] is that the fact?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say that the Committee on Lobbying has come to no conclusion as to any definition of the word "lobbying."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It would seem to me that the first thing the committee should do—I hesitate even to offer a suggestion—that the first thing the committee should do would be to get a definition of "lobbying." Can the gentleman tell me what he considers lobbying to be? Can he give me some definition?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would remind the gentleman from Michigan that ours is an investigating committee, not a legislative committee; that the definition of the word "lobbying" comes within the realm of the proper legislative committee of the House; it is up to them to define the term and to make their recommendation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. With all due respect, if the chairman of the committee investigating lobbying cannot give me a definition of lobbying, I cannot see how he is going to get very far. How can a committee investigate lobbying if it does not know what it is looking for, if it does not know the definition of lobbying?

There is one question I would like to ask. Where runs the line of demarcation between the constitutional right of petition, the right to free speech, to a free press, on the one hand, and improper, illegal lobbying on the other and only which the committee was authorized to investigate, or, if you wish, lobbying which the Congress has the right to regulate?

Where runs the line of distinction between the activities of the Constitutional Educational League and the Committee for Constitutional Government which oppose the political thinking of the administration but support no candidates, and the activities of the labor unions which openly by propaganda and the use of money attempt to defeat Congressmen who oppose the New Deal, the Fair Deal, and who frequently claim that they are responsible for the election or the defeat of Members of the other body, of this body?

Why is it they have not been called in?

Are their efforts solely educational or are they lobbying, not only for legislation but for candidates?

Everyone has the answer to that last question. We all know they have been spending their money to defeat their political opponents, to elect their supporters. But to date they have not been called upon to give the kind of information that these other gentlemen were subpenaed before the committee to give.

I recall very clearly something like 5 or 6 years ago when certain labor unions announced that they had $4,000,000 to be used to defeat candidates for Congress, and they named me. I thought they were going to lobby around in my district; I did not know.

I do know they called for my political execution. Two great labor unions have publicly announced they intend to defeat Members of Congress and that they have millions with which to do it. Did you send the same questionnaire to them? No, you did not.

Maybe their activities are just educational. But where and how do they get their funds?

I understood that the staff of the committee was working on the matter of going down to the folding room and inquiring as to how many speeches I and other Members of Congress had sent out. Now, I have no objection to that if you will go over on the other side and get the speeches of the Democrats, the New Dealers, the Fair Dealers, and other Members with, let us say, hobbies of their own. And more especially of those who opposed the activities of the Dies committee and its successor.

To my regret I must say that I have never been able to convince the people of the country that the New Deal was wrong.

I will say, too, if I advocate constitutional government, which I do, government under the Constitution, I have a right to send out the speeches I make on the floor. I have a right to send out an editorial if it is inserted in the RECORD.

If the course the committee is following is an accurate one, then every single editor is engaged in lobbying. You might just as well subpena in the business management of all the Washington newspapers and ask them how much they get for advertising because without the advertising money those editors would not be able to express their opinion on legislation. They would go broke within a month.

A Congressman does not need ability any more. All he needs to do is to get up in the morning, get the Washington papers, take the editorial page, and he will find there a complete program of what he should do all day long every day as long as he is here. If those editorials are not propaganda, what are they? To be consistent, the Lobbying Committee should ask the advertisers where and how and from whom they get the money to buy the advertising space which enables the editors to continue their editorial lobbying.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to congratulate the gentleman on his statement that he did not care just so they would hit all alike, move in on everyone in the same way, because that is exactly the position taken by me in the committee. I objected to this questionnaire that went out to 166 corporations or business concerns for two reasons, because it went far beyond the power of our committee in the kind of questions it was asking that were not apropos; secondly, because the list was very significant as to who was left out. I objected, for instance, to asking these questions of all the rubber companies of America except International Latex which spent, of course, all kinds of money advertising in favor of legislation supported by administration sources. I objected, of course, to the fact that the steel companies were all included except Mr. Kaiser's company.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Was not Mr. Kaiser on that list?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Oh, no, no.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is he not the fellow who got the loan of millions from the RFC?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Let me go ahead. I objected, of course, to the fact that they named a number of airplane manufacturing companies but somehow or other missed Consolidated Vultee; they named automobile companies but they missed the Kaiser-Frazer Co., just happened to somehow or other miss Mr. Pauley's oil company and other people who seemed to be very close favorites of the administration. They only wanted information as to the individual who had contributed to certain right-wing organizations and did not ask anybody if they made a contribution or bought a book from any left-wing organization, even the Society for Soviet Friendship. They did not inquire into that. All I have been protesting for is that we be fair about it and ask everyone and go right down the middle of the road. I am glad that the gentleman is taking the same position.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman has brought up the question of the franking privilege of Members of the House. I am sure he is aware of the rules of the House.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I sure am.

Mr. BUCHANAN. May I ask the gentleman, has he ever permitted his frank to be used by the Committee for Constitutional Government?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. No; that is not the way I figure it. If and when I inserted their ideas in the RECORD, it was inserted because I thought it was sound doctrine and, like other matters put into the RECORD and which I thought was sound doctrine, I may have franked it out and, when I did, what business is that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] or of his committee?

We have not yet reached the day when you or your committee can tell me what I may think, what I shall send out after the material is inserted in the RECORD.

To do so would permit you to exercise thought control and that, I for one, will not do.

A discredited, notorious United States district attorney, William Power Maloney, tried to pull that stunt on me back in '42. He did not succeed, nor will any snooping, prying smear artist do so, even if he is on the payroll of your committee. It just happens that there are some things that a committee cannot do.

The gentleman has now revealed the fact, which before I only suspected, that he at least is aware of the snooping, the attempt at intimidation by the employees on his staff.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman permitted that in violation of the rules of the House?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. It is not a violation of the rules of the House at all.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Possibly I can refresh the gentleman's memory.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman can refresh my memory all you wish. I said the other day that the Constitutional Educational League, the Joe Kamp organization, had reprinted a speech of mine; it is called Frame-up in Steel. That was reprinted and sent out at their own expense.

The other organization asked permission to reprint that talk in two forms and some went out under my frank to a list I approved. If you want to make anything of that, try it.

I may say to the gentleman that I intend to continue sending out material of that kind and it does not make much difference who furnishes those lists—not at all, just so long as the talks are constructive and tend to keep constitutional government in force here.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I am seeking information. I am very much interested in what the gentleman from Pennsylvania just said. It is a surprise to me. When did the sending out under frank of one of our speeches become illegal or not right under the rules of the House?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman does not need to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is not illegal.

The question was passed upon by the Solicitor of the Department several years ago. That question came up with the dean of the Michigan delegation. We have the correspondence, and we stayed within the law, which is something that the departments have not done. And, I will ask the gentleman is it lobbying when the Attorney General, at the time of the $100 plate dinner, asks the United States district attorneys to come down here at Government expense, so they could attend the $100 a plate dinner? Just a coincidence.

Let me ask you this, Did not the papers yesterday carry the story that the Speaker of the House presented to the National Democratic Committee a check, I think it was $100,000, money contributed by the people of Texas? Was that lobbying? Of course not. It is a legitimate campaign contribution.

But, if you follow the course you have followed against those who advocate adherence to constitutional government, you would have all of those who contributed toward the $100,000 in from Texas, ask them how much they contributed, why and for what purposes, and you would ask them to give an accounting of the expenses of all their business agents over the last 3 or 4 years. If you were consistent, that is what you would do. And you might, while you were at it, ask them whether they thought that such contributions might possibly—just possibly—have some effect on proposed legislation to nullify the recent Supreme Court decision on tidal lands. But, when it comes to a Republican Member going out making speeches for $250 a speech, what do you do? You can talk about Members of the House on this side, but you do not talk about how many on your own side have made speeches for money. If you want to get into that end of it, go ahead. And do not forget to ask in Cabinet members and others on the executive department payroll. I do not fear any investigation, but I do not propose to be intimidated or silenced by your snoopers going down to the folding room. If you want to wash dirty political linen, start on your own side of the aisle. Do not come over here. You will find none in my closet.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. I came in when a statement was being made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in which I understood him to say that the committee had not yet determined what lobbying was. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That is correct.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Do you mean the committee does not know what lobbying is?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I asked the chairman the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] if he knew what lobbying was, and he said he had not made up his mind. He sits here now, and if he wants to give a definition of lobbying, I will be glad to have it, and I think the Members of the House and the the people of the country would be glad to know what he is trying to investigate.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. How can you investigate something if you do not know what it is?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, ask him.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I might say that in the present Lobbying Act there is no definition, and I do not feel that it is within the realm of the investigating committee to state at this stage of the game and set up any definition of the term lobbying.

But, in concluding our hearings we will make recommendations to the proper committee of the House, the Committee on the Judiciary, and they, in turn, of course, if they see fit to report any legislation to amend the present act on the floor, will take care of that definition.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Apparently, then, what the gentleman's staff has been doing, what he intends to continue doing, is to snoop around on a fishing expedition, and after he has smeared the opposition, that is, those who do not adopt the political views of his snoopers, come up with some sort of a derogatory report which might defeat some of the political opponents of the New Deal.

The gentleman asked me a question, so let me ask him one. Are you going to ask the Kaufman Department Stores, Irving Wolf, vice president and general manager, to give you the same information that you asked of the other corporations?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If there is no definition of lobbying in the act, what then determines the scope of the investigation?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I would not know. The gentleman is a better parliamentarian than I am. Apparently the views of the gentleman's snoopers, the committee staff, is to have unlimited authority to intimidate all businessmen and corporations who are not New Dealers or who contribute to nullify the communistic or socialistic trend.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is the reason I have been very reluctant to agree to the charges that have been made that certain organizations were or were not lobbying, because I do not think any of us know, and yet charges have been made constantly that some one was engaged in lobbying activities, and that those organizations are engaged in lobbying activities. Now, they have registered, as I understand it, as lobbyists under the law, as far as some of their activities are concerned, but as I have tried to point out, you may register as a lobbyist because you are interested in mail rate legislation, for instance, but still that does not mean that everything you do in the publishing business is a lobbying activity, and inasmuch as we ourselves have been unable to agree as to what a lobbyist really is or what lobbying means, I urged very early in the hearings that we call upon men of broad experience, men such as the Speaker, the leader of the majority, the leader of the minority, the Vice President, who served for 30 years in Congress, the leaders of the Senate and other men of broad legislative experience, such as Mr. SABATH, Mr. DOUGHTON, and others, to come and sit with us in executive session and to try to tell us how this law could be strengthened and get to work better. We all want factual information as to those who are endeavoring to influence legislation, and yet we do not want to invade the rights of the people, and I think that has been the whole question, and it is a serious one.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

(Mr. JACKSON of Washington asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a table.)

POWER POLICY OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives has again been subjected to further complaints about the so-called Soviet power policy of the State of Washington. I for one am not prepared to stand idly by while the State of Washington is being accused of having a Soviet power policy, or while the implication is made that the people of Washington, who themselves have approved the State's public power policy at the polls, are followers of a Communist-inspired policy.

My good friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JENSEN] made a statement in the House on June 1 concerning our PUD law. I should like to answer the gentleman, point by point.

Point No. 1: The gentleman heads his statement, "The Soviet power policy of the State of Washington."

In this connection, I should like to ask the gentleman:

Is our PUD law Soviet because it was first approved by a vote of all the people of our State in the 1930 election?

Is it Soviet because the basic policies of the law were reaffirmed by all the voters of our State—by votes of 3 to 2—in 1940 and again in 1946?

Is the law Soviet because it requires that the voters of each county or district vote affirmatively to set up a public utility district?

Is the law Soviet because its principles and ideas originated with the State Grange—one of our leading American farm organizations?

I ask the gentleman, "What law could have more democratic foundations than one which has been three times approved by a vote of all the people? What law in Iowa, where the voters do not have the privilege of initiative and referendum, has such consistent popular support?"

May I say to the gentleman that if he believes this to be a Soviet power policy then he must believe that an overwhelming majority of the people of the State of Washington embrace the principles of communism. The people of Washington State resent such an implication. Our PUD law is now supported by Democrats and Republicans alike. It has proved to our people that it meets a real need. Should it fail to show its merits our people have the right and the privilege to modify the law.

Point No. 2: My good friend makes a number of statements and suggestions about the public-utility districts and the taxes they pay and do not pay. I should like to cite one statement in particular:

I would also like to remind my good friends that REA, municipal, and privately owned power companies of our Nation pay in the neighborhood of $1,000,000 annually in local, State, and Federal taxes, and that those companies in my State of Iowa, like most other States, are not ducking, but are willing to pay, and do pay, their fair share of taxes.

There are a number of points that should be made clear:

First. It is suggested that the PUD's in Washington State are ducking their fair share of taxes. I point out to the gentleman that the PUD's pay State and local taxes in exactly the same manner as do municipalities and REA co-ops.

I point out to the gentleman that in a great many cases, because the PUD's have been able to satisfy better the needs of the people and have expanded their facilities, their contributions in State and local taxes far exceed the contributions made by the privately owned power companies that preceded them. I insert in the RECORD at this point a table showing how much the taxes paid by nine existing PUD's exceed those paid by the companies previously serving the area. It will be noted that the table also includes figures denoting the amount of annual rate reductions which have been achieved since the PUD was set up. These represent a direct benefit to the people of the area.

Comparison of taxes paid in 1949 by public utility districts and taxes paid by company previously serving the area

Public utility district	Taxes paid in 1949	Company previously serving area	Taxes paid in year indicated
Clallam County public utility district	$16,347	Olympic Park Service Co	$2,642 (1942)
Grays Harbor public utility district, annual rate reduction.	[1] 121,154 [1] 220,367	Grays Harbor Ry. & Light Twin Harbors Electric Co	96,613 (1938) 2,701 (1939)
Ferry County public utility district	4,557	Republic Power Co	3,487 (1944)
Grant County public utility district, annual rate reduction.	[1] 38,033 [1] 39,447	Grant Power Co Soap Lake Utilities Co	1,036 (1941) 1,586 (1941)
Pacific County public utility district, annual rate reduction.	[1] 28,039 [1] 51,121	Williapa Electric Co West Coast Power Co	10,725 (1938) 14,900 [2] (1939)
Wahkiakum County public utility district, annual rate reduction.	[1] 6,434 [1] 9,030	West Coast Power Co	3,732 [2] (1939)
Skamania County public utility district, annual rate reduction.	[1] 9,582 [1] 5,972	West Coast Power Co. (Stevenson division). West Coast Power Co. (Shelton division).	2,279 (1939) 9,689 (1939)
Mason County public utility district No. 3	27,365
Cowlitz County public utility district, annual rate reduction.	172,022 78,696	Washington Gas & Electric Co	87,621 (1940)

[1] Amount representing annual rate reductions adopted pursuant to beginning of service by public utility districts.
[2] Division of taxes estimated in proportion to prices paid by the 2 districts for respective properties.

Second. I point out to the gentleman, further, that the taxes paid by the private power companies are, in reality, merely passed on to the consumer or ratepayer. Since these companies are actually monopolies, operating with the consent of the State, their rates are fixed by a State public service commission. This commission sets the rates so as to allow a fair return on investment, after taxes have been paid. Therefore, the power company is guaranteed a profit no matter what its taxes; and it is the ratepayer and the consumer who bears the burden, not the power company.

Third. There appears to be a suggestion, in the gentleman's statement that "REA, municipal and privately owned power companies of our Nation pay in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 annually in local, State and Federal taxes," that REA's and municipalities pay Federal income taxes. I am sure that my good friend knows very well that REA's and municipalities are Federal tax-free, in exactly the same way the PUD's in my State of Washington are.

If the gentleman objects to the Federal tax-free status of the PUD's, I wonder if he is advocating applying Federal income taxes to REA co-ops, of which, I understand, there are a number in the gentleman's own State?

I turn now to point number three: In the past the gentleman has complained about the way in which PUD's took over private power facilities through condemnation proceedings. Now he finds fault with the only other method by which PUD's can acquire property—that is, through negotiated purchase. The acquisition of over three-fourths of the properties taken over by the PUD's from private utilities in our State came about through negotiated purchase. This is, of course, a normal practice in all businesses.

I think it should also be pointed out that private power companies have the right of condemnation of certain lands in order to extend their properties. They acquire this right by virtue of their monopoly position, which makes them semi-public in nature. The overriding consideration, in all cases, is the public interest.

Point No. 4: The gentleman states:

Hundreds of millions of tax dollars are expended by Congress in building great Federal power-producing facilities and transmission lines to furnish electric energy to these Federal tax-free PUD's at a rate so low no Federal taxpaying private industry can possibly compete.

Does the gentleman object to the fact that these same Federal power facilities are furnishing substantial amounts of power—at the same low rate—to the private power companies of the Pacific Northwest? Is that a bad investment of the taxpayers' money? Does the gentleman realize that the Northwest power companies probably could not exist without this low-cost Federal power? Does he realize that Pacific Power & Light gets 54 percent of its power from the Bonneville Power Administration? That Portland General Electric gets 65 percent of its power from BPA, and Puget Sound Power & Light 37 percent and Washington Water Power 22 percent from the Federal Government—at the same low rates as are furnished to the PUD's?

And does the gentleman object to the fact that Federal power facilities are also supplying electric energy at low rates to the REA co-ops in his own State? These are Federal-tax free in exactly the same way as our Washington State PUD's.

And does the gentleman object to the provision that has been on the statute books since 1902 that calls for first preference in the furnishing of publicly generated power to publicly owned organizations and cooperatives? Without that provision, he might find many of his own REA co-ops short of power.

And I am sure that the gentleman realizes that every cent of the investment in Federal power facilities now being made by our taxpayers is due to be repaid to the Federal Treasury. As a matter of fact, the Federal facilities in the Northwest are ahead of their repayment schedules.

So I wonder just exactly what it is the gentleman objects to. Surely the public utility districts of Washington State are not the sole beneficiaries of the very wise investment in Federal power facilities. REA co-ops, free of Federal taxation, as well as private power companies, share the benefits.

The PUD law of the State of Washington is a law that came from the people. The voters were asked in 1930, and again in 1940 and 1946 whether they liked the law or not. They went to the polls and said they approved of the law—by overwhelming votes. In 22 of our 39 counties, the people have gone to the polls and elected to set up PUD's which would serve their needs.

Our public power programs, far from being a Soviet creation, continue to be the sparkplug of Washington's ever-expanding private-enterprise economy. Without them, our State would, at best, remain static. Instead, Washington has experienced a tremendous growth in recent years. With our public power policy—a policy initiated by the people and supported by the people, we shall continue to forge ahead, with new jobs, new industries, new wealth—yes, and new sources of Federal and State revenue.

The people of my State are perfectly capable of making their own decisions.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. HORAN. I compliment my colleague from the State of Washington for the very factual, and I think very sound, statement regarding the power facilities in the State of Washington, which belong to the people we represent.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. HORAN. Long ago we recognized that we had something in excess of 25,000,000 kilowatts in the Columbia River area extending as it does from the eastern boundary of the district of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and clear to the tidewaters; north from the lower boundaries of Oregon and Idaho up to the Canadian boundary and even beyond. It is a tremendous national asset. We know that it will be developed. I was one of the leaders to put over the fight for a district power bill in 1920. Long ago we realized that we either had to take hold of that thing ourselves, through any implementation that we had, or allow great syndicates of bankers and Wall Street, as we like to refer to it, to take charge of the Columbia River. It is going to be the toil of the people that you and I represent that will pay for this development. That is a point that I think is sometimes forgotten. Even on the Mississippi, the Missouri, and the Ohio much of that money will not be reimbursed. But the things we are doing for the Columbia River will be reimbursed by the people we represent. They had to make their choice and they did choose to set up an implementation in which they would have a vote, so that they would have some responsibility, some priority, and some personal charge over the development and use of the Columbia River. We either had to choose between Wall Street and setting up the thing so that we could run it ourselves. Of course, today we sometimes fear too much interference from the Federal Government. So that, rather than having a Soviet arrangement as referred to by the gentleman from Iowa, I think we are really demonstrating something that is definitely by way of self-government. I thank the gentleman for allowing me to express myself.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for his excellent contribution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I join with the gentleman from Washington in commending the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON], who just addressed the House, for his statesmanlike and factual speech on the power situation as it exists in the State of Washington and the Northwest. I am glad that the gentleman has brought out the fact that both private and public utilities can get along together in the Northwest. I am glad that the gentleman has emphasized the fact that there have been three referendums in the State of Washington, which indicated overwhelmingly that the people were in support of this power program. This expression of the people's will is not a Soviet power policy; what the State of Washington has done is democracy in action. The people have expressed their wishes through the ballot box on three separate occasions, as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] has so ably brought out.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. The gentleman is exactly right. I do not know of a more accurate way to get the sentiment of the people of a State than to permit all of the people of a State to vote on an issue.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I started to interrupt the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN] a moment ago to remind him that the money invested in the Tennessee Valley Authority would be paid back with interest. We are paying back every dollar of it, and we have gone a little further than you have on the Columbia River, because the Authority fixes the maximum retail rates in order to prevent exploiting of the people in that area. I was here and I knew all about the organization of these public utility districts. I do not believe there is a man in this House who has fought communism more than I have. If so, I would like to meet him. I am as anti-Communist as they make them.

The people of the State of Washington are not trying to take over all the land. They are not trying to close all the churches. They are not trying to subject the people of Washington to alien ideologies. They are simply trying to enjoy their own resources, and they are doing a marvelous job of it.

The people of Oregon are doing the same thing.

The people in the Tennessee Valley area, which means every county in the district I represent, are enjoying the benefits of cheap electricity,. public power, if you please; because the power business is public business.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I think it should be pointed out that it has created a tremendous number of new private industries in the area of the Pacific Northwest and in the Tennessee Valley area.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; and if it had not been for the TVA and the Columbia River, the Government never would have developed the atomic bomb in time to beat the other fellow to it in the last war, because it was on its way from the other side.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington may proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. As I said, the power business is public business. It has become a necessity of our modern life. It must be handled by a monopoly. Any monopoly on a necessity of life is a public business. But in addition to that, the water power of the Nation already belongs to the Federal Government. The Supreme Court so decided in both the Ashwander case and in the Appalachian Power case.

Just the other day a gentleman from Michigan attacked the Tennessee Valley Authority, Rural Electrification, and so forth. I just happened to take a glance at the State of Michigan and I find that last year the people of Michigan used 11,428,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity for which they paid $232,000,000. The people of the State of Washington used about the same amount, 11,580,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electrical energy, but instead of paying $232,000,000 for it they paid $84,000,000.

Public power is improving the standard of living throughout this Nation. If it had not been for the public-power fight that we have gone through for the last 15 years, the average farmer in America would not have seen electric lights in his home for the next generation.

I congratulate the gentleman from Washington on the splendid statement that he has made. No man has a right to criticize what the people of Washington and Oregon are trying to do, to use the resources that God Almighty has given them.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman for his fine statement.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. HORAN. The gentleman from Washington serves on the Subcommittee on Interior Appropriations. I wonder if he could supply for the RECORD or recite right now the amount of money that has been paid back to the Treasury of the United States because of the existence of the Grand Coulee Dam?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I do not recall the exact figures offhand, but I know that it is estimated that for the fiscal year 1951 the Bonneville Power Administration, which is the marketing agency for the Government-owned dams in the northwest region will take in approximately $31,000,000 and will leave a net return to the Treasury after allowing for amortization of the construction cost of these dams, will leave a net return—after interest also on the amount of money spent—of about 7 or 8 million dollars. In other words it is being repaid ahead of schedule.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me call attention to the fact that instead of the men from that midwest area criticizing the Tennessee Valley Authority and the Columbia River Valley operations they had better join us in developing the Missouri River. There are 25,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of electricity going to waste every year in the Missouri River and its tributaries, which, firmed up to the peak of the average year, would be far more than every State in that area is using. They had better catch the step and help to use the resources of America for their own people, instead of criticizing us, because we have taken one step in advance of them and are using the resources that God has given us for the benefit of the people of this area.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield.

Mr. ANGELL. I want to commend the gentleman for his statement and thank him. Certainly he knows that I am deeply interested in this whole problem. Is it not a fact that the greatest increase in the population of the United States in the last 10 years has taken place in the three Western States of Oregon, California, and Washington?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. Percentagewise, that is correct.

Mr. ANGELL. And as a result of that there has been a very great demand for electric power, energy, not only for commercial use but also for agricultural and other uses, and that every single kilowatt that has been developed during the war in the Columbia River area has been taxed to the utmost to provide the demands for hydroelectric power, and that we have not enough at the present time? Only about 10 percent of the substantial hydroelectric power in the Columbia River Basin has been developed. Is that not correct?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. The gentleman is correct. There are approximately 33,000,000 potential kilowatts available in the area and only about 10 percent of the total potential has been harnessed.

Mr. HORAN. The gentleman has brought to the attention of the House the fact that we are ahead of schedule in the paying out of the Columbia River project in reimbursement to the Federal Government for money invested in hydroelectric facilities.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. HORAN. The drainage area which the Columbia River serves has no gas, it has no oil, none whatever, and the coal we have is of a very low quality. So hydroelectric energy becomes something that is very, very essential to us and it is a very, very important point with us.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. The gentleman is right. Not only is it essential to our area but it is essential to the national security as well. The industrial potential of this Nation may one day determine whether we will be free or slaves, and that applies not only to our country but to the rest of the free world.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I want to say that according to the information I have, Grand Coulee itself is 8 years ahead of its repayment schedule and Bonneville is between 5 and 6 years. Furthermore, the question has been raised about loss of tax revenue. Is it not a fact that with the development of the hydroelectric potential in the State of Washington and the Northwest that the tax base is considerably broadened and that in the end there will be more tax dollars created which will come into the State and Federal treasuries? More jobs have been created because new private industries have been attracted by power, and more security for the people of the Northwest has been the result.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. The gentleman is correct. In addition to repaying the investment, we are providing a new source of Federal revenue. These facilities pay the local and State taxes just as private enterprises and in some cases they pay more than private enterprise would.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has again expired.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for one additional minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of Washington.. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. I wish to assure the gentleman that in the Middle West the great majority of the people are very happy because of the development in the Pacific Northwest and as one coming from Chicago I think I speak more accurately the sentiment of the people in our section of the Middle West than the gentleman from Iowa whose criticism of what the people in the Pacific Northwest are doing the gentleman has so conclusively, so convincingly, and so strongly answered today. I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. JACKSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman very much.

MAIL DELIVERY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General's order of April 17 curtailing delivery of mails and other essential postal services has inflicted great hardship upon the people of Lowell, Mass., and other communities throughout the country. At Lowell persons must now deposit mail in the mailboxes by 7 o'clock in the evening in order to have it collected before the next day.

I have received thousands and thousands of letters from my district, the State and the Nation protesting this hardship that has resulted from one delivery of mail a day. Personally it has meant a great loss to me in connection with my work and also some financial loss. The curtailment of mail service is working much hardship on the people and it is a great financial loss to business and industry.

The following editorial is from the Lowell Sun of June 14, 1950:

CURTAILING SERVICE

Just one or two more cuts in postal service, reducing it from the standard to which the American people have been accustomed, and there will be open public rebellion.

Mail deliveries have been reduced here in Lowell as well as elsewhere. Now the people of Lowell are advised that they must have their night mail in neighborhood boxes before 7 p. m. each night or miss the chance to have the mail picked up before morning.

This is a cutback that does not set well. The people are entitled to expect routine service such as they have been receiving for years. And 9 p. m. pickups are just routine—nothing more.

PUBLIC VERSUS PRIVATE POWER

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TACKETT. Mr. Speaker, I notice that everyone who advocates the abolition of private power by public power emphasizes the fact that private power is a monopoly. At the same time, whether it is knowingly or unknowingly, a public monopoly brings into existence the most powerful monopoly known to man, a Government monopoly.

The Tennessee Valley experience has certainly conclusively proven that the electric bill can be lowered by Government subsidized power. But at the same time it has proven conclusively that the taxpayers pay more than the money that they get in return on lower electric bills. I notice that the gentleman from Mississippi always insists that the Tennessee Valley Authority has done great things for the rural electrification program in TVA land, of which Mississippi is a part, and yet the State of Mississippi has less rural electrification than any State in the Union, barring none. Down in the State of Arkansas, where we have nothing but private enterprise so far as the power industry is concerned, we have more rural electricity, on a percentagewise basis or any other way he wants to figure, than does TVA land in the State of Mississippi, which is the lowest State in the Union so far as rural housing electrification is concerned or in bringing electricity to the farm people. Yes, we can talk about public power and the abolition of private enterprise in the power field because it is a monopoly. Then the Government can take over the telephone system because it is a monopoly; they can take over transportation just as easily because it is a monopoly, and yet the gentleman from Mississippi says that power is a public responsibility because it is a necessity. I guess we just eat because it is comfortable; we wear clothes because it is in style. No one other than an outspoken socialist would advocate that the Government sell groceries or clothing, and yet those items are more of a necessity than electricity. That old stuff that because electricity is a necessity it is a public responsibility is just as wrong as it can be.

Oh, yes, the gentleman says he fights communism, and I know that is true; he fights communism; but you know that to denounce an enemy while advocating the policy of the enemy fools no one and adds up to loving and assisting the enemy. Public power that abolishes private enterprise may not be communistic, but it certainly is socialistic. These philosophies are twin sisters. They advocate Government ownership, Government control, Government regulation, and regimentation of the people.

Now, it is popular to advocate socialism in the name of dynamic democracy. Oh, yes, I can stand on the street corner and say, "Look what I brought you. I brought you some free electricity. It is not going to cost you anything." And, the people just clap their hands and say, "Look what he has given us." We have not given you anything, and TVA land experience has proven to the world that it has not given anybody anything. It is costing the taxpayers of the country more, a lot more, than the electric bill savings of the consumers of electricity in TVA land and elsewhere. TVA was supposed to be a yardstick; we were going to use that to lower the cost of electricity in the State of Arkansas and elsewhere. Now that was as far as it was supposed to go. President Roosevelt never contended that we should fill up this country with public power and replace private enterprise. My friends, I am afraid that sometimes we forget that individual ambition and free enterprise have made this country great. For the Government to take over responsibilities that can and will be properly carried out by private enterprise kills that ambition of men and women to go forward in life with incentive to do something more tomorrow than they do today. We may soon find ourselves in the same position as some countries in the past that spent vast sums of public money building something that private enterprise can overcome overnight.

We went into World Wars I and II unprepared. We had no machinery with which to fight a war. But because of the freedom of the people of this country we could overnight convert those private utilities into war machinery. The people in this country cannot survive under democracy if we keep killing the individual initiative of man every time we get a chance.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] is recognized for 10 minutes.

FLAG DAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, Flag Day in this year of 1950, which took place yesterday, June 14—the House not being in session—should be more than a passing commemorative event. Altogether too often our symbolic occasions have a tendency to become haphazard anniversaries, and their true significance becomes lost in the welter of extraneous celebration. National holidays, in many instances, have been deprived of their character as days of dedication, and, as the events which they recall recede into the dim past, the spirit which impelled their establishment is neglected.

The spirit of Flag Day need never die, for in the symbolism of the flag of the United States there is caught up the spirit of the land and the people to which and to whom it is the banner of liberty, the sign of faith in democracy, and the representation of hope for a peaceful future.

Its 13 stripes and 48 stars signify the unity of great States welded into a magnificent commonwealth where the people govern under a Constitution born after the travail of a War of Revolution won under the inspiration of those same Stars and Stripes. It is this flag and that Constitution which, nearly 175 years later, make us realize the blessings of American democracy.

Without fundamental change, the handiwork of 175 years ago has survived through wars, panic, depression, fratricidal strife, and social upheaval.

We here—together with all of our fellow Americans—are the inheritors of the traditions of democracy and representative government which were then founded for posterity.

In a more particular sense, however, we here are the specific legatees of the saluters of the first Old Glory.

For to our hands, as the craftsmen of government has been entrusted the delicate task and high privilege of perpetuating a priceless heritage.

It is axiomatic that with exceptional privilege there goes a corresponding duty to grave responsibility.

That responsibility falls equally upon each of us—and the occurrence of Flag Day gives occasion to revivify our zeal for conscientious performance of that duty with the inspiration of rededication.

We stand in need of that inspiration.

We require it to combat and dissipate the callous indifference which has led millions of Americans to take the blessings of liberty for granted.

We need it to spur our personal efforts for the achievement of a Nation-wide civic consciousness concerning the worth of American ideals in contrast with baser ideologies abroad in the world today.

When the flag and the Constitution were new, confidence in the worth of the Anglo-American ideals of individual freedom and personal integrity prompted the founding fathers to create and establish their unique experiment in republican government.

Today, not only that Government, but also the ideals upon which it was founded, are the targets of both subtle and open attack.

If we are to check and repel such attacks, it is imperative that we fight ideas with ideas.

Authoritarianism, tyranny and despotism can neither take root nor grow in a spiritual soil fertilized with the democratic ideas and ideals of genuine Americanism.

It is our mutual duty and sacred trust to aid in the restoration of the faith of our political forefathers and to rekindle the fire of pride in the soundness of the American heritage.

We must render that aid by positive and affirmative action, for it would be folly to risk the privileges of liberty with a negative attitude of indifference.

As beneficiaries of that American heritage we should strive to be its most stalwart defenders and the vigilant opponents of its traducers.

If freedom is everybody's job, our share of that job resolves itself into a solemn trust.

It is a trust which may be discharged by the practice of a few simple civic virtues and the conscientious performance of the ordinary duties of citizenship.

The first duty is one of loyalty—undivided loyalty—loyalty to our institutions, our ideals, our traditions, so that the people, the true masters of this Nation, may deem us worthy and faithful servants.

This is the highest aspect of our trust, for if the integrity of the democratic processes which we are privileged to operate is to be preserved, the faith of the operators in them and their loyalty to them must be above reproach.

Next, loyal attachment to the ideals of democracy must be accompanied by a justifiable pride in our past history and our accomplishments as a nation. The history of the flag itself is a proud saga.

Self-tuition in the mental disciplines of classical history and American political philosophy will disclose the sources of our liberty and develop a sense of pride in our institutions.

Thirdly, we must recognize that the privileges of citizenship under a flag of freedom entail concomitant duties.

Indulgence in our rights carries the obligation, not only of not denying them to others, but of actively and militantly campaigning for their extension to, and enjoyment by, all peoples everywhere.

Fourth, in the exercise of rights and in the performance of civic duties, it is incumbent upon us that we be exemplars of Americanism.

It is vitally important that, as part of the body politic, we cultivate independent habits of thought, intelligently exercise the right of franchise, advise and take counsel regarding pending public questions, contribute to the formation of sound public policies, and seek wider avenues for the rendition of public service. It is a melancholy thought that, under many flags today, men with free wills can do none of these things.

Finally, we must practice what we preach by demonstrating through adherence to a code of personal and official ethics, our own abiding faith in our constitutional representative democracy, and the civil, religious, economic, and social liberties which it guarantees.

Such a democracy is not static.

It can grow, develop, and wax strong under our flag of liberty.

It can also be sapped of its vigor and become weak.

It may even be permitted to die.

In order that our generation may not be accused of signing its death warrant, let us here resolve to make constant sacrifice on the altar of patriotism so that our pledge of allegiance to our flag and our rededication to the ideals of the American Republic will be a worthy prayer and oblation.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 7, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Spirit, we thank Thee that Thou art not far off, out on the vast rim of the universe; but nearer to us than breathing; warm, sweet, tender, a present help, waiting to live in us, to work through us; our daily sustenance, the fountain of a courage that will not fail and of a power that can use our so fallible weakness as its healing and illuminating channel.

In this confused day, with its noisy voices and contending claims, grant unto these Thy servants that they may be faithful to every trust committed by the people to their hands, giving utterance only to their highest, noblest thought; and that upon their shoulders there may rest unsullied the white mantle of the Nation's honor. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, June 15, 1950, was dispensed with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. YOUNG was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for all of next week.

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HOLLAND was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Foreign Relations, sitting jointly, were authorized to meet this afternoon during the session of the Senate.

On request of Mr. MCFARLAND, and by unanimous consent, a subcommittee of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the quorum call the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] be permitted to propound questions on the pending social-security measure to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately thereafter the calendar be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For the consideration of measures to which there is no objection?

Mr. MCFARLAND. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Arizona? The Chair hears none, and the calendar will be called, beginning at the point where we left off at the last call of the calendar.

ORDER FOR TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I modify my previous request for unanimous consent, and ask that after we have a quorum call Senators be permitted to submit petitions and memorials, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and present routine matters for the RECORD, without debate, before the questions of the Senator from Florida to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MCFARLAND. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

NATURALIZATION OF IMMIGRANTS HAVING LEGAL RIGHT TO PERMANENT RESIDENCE

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing it disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to provide the privilege of becoming a naturalized citizen of the United States to all immigrants having a legal right to permanent residence, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCARRAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. McCARRAN, Mr. EASTLAND, and Mr. JENNER conferees on the part of the Senate.

REVISED ESTIMATE, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR (S. DOC. NO. 186)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a revised estimate of appropriation, involving an increase of $5,199,400, fiscal year 1951, for the Department of the Interior, in the form of an amendment to the budget, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

STANDARDS AND GRADES OF BEEF—RESOLUTION OF NEBRASKA STOCK GROWERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the sixty-first annual convention of the Nebraska Stock Growers Association at Alliance, Nebr., relating to changing the present standards and grades of beef.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 6

Resolution on grading beef carcasses

Whereas there is today an effort on the part of certain individuals and organizations to change the present standards and grades of carcass beef as set forth on page 2845 of the Federal Register, dated Friday, May 12, 1950; and

Whereas many years of effort at much cost has been put forth to publicize and establish in the minds of the consuming public, students, and producers of beef animals the present and satisfactory standards and grades; and

Whereas we believe that such proposed "up-grading" of beef carcasses, will tend to weaken the confidence on the part of the general public who are now familiar with and have confidence in our present grades of beef carcasses; and

Whereas we believe that such proposed "up-grading" by bringing carcasses of lower grades into higher brackets than now expressed will, in the minds of the general public, be taken as an act of deception: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Nebraska Stock Growers Association in its sixty-first annual convention assembled at Alliance, Nebr., this 10th day of June, 1950, go on record as absolutely opposed to any change in the present and universally accepted standards and grades of beef, and that copies of this resolution be filed with the director of the Livestock Branch, Production and Marketing Administration, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., on or before July 11, 1950.

COUNTY OF BOX BUTTE,
State of Nebraska, ss:

The above and foregoing is a true and exact copy of the resolution adopted at the sixty-first annual convention of the Nebraska Stock Growers Association, at the annual business session, June 10, 1950.

W. A. JOHNSON,
Secretary-Treasurer.

13. On page 358, line 18, strike out "$3,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,200."

The statement presented by Mr. MYERS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS ON INTRODUCING MAXIMUM WAGE BASE AMENDMENT TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. President, I am submitting an amendment to increase the taxable wage base as set forth in the social-security bill reported from the Senate Finance Committee, an amendment to increase this base from $3,000 to $4,200. Joining me in sponsoring this amendment are Senators LUCAS, BENTON, DOUGLAS, GREEN, HUMPHREY, KILGORE, LEHMAN, MCMAHON, MURRAY, NEELY, PEPPER, and Senator THOMAS of Utah.

I do not intend to go into any great detail on the wage-base question. I feel that by now it has been very thoroughly discussed in the preceding debate and I think that the arguments are pretty well understood.

Fifteen of the seventeen members of the Senate Advisory Council on Social Security recommended that the wage base, established at $3,000 in 1939, be increased to $4,200 in order to carry out the policy determined by the Congress in the original law. When the $3,000 wage base was set up in 1939, 95 percent of the employees working at covered jobs had average earnings of $3,000 a year or less. In view, now, of today's high wage levels, the figure of $4,200 is required to bring the wage base in line with present conditions, and I do not see how any substantial argument can be raised against this.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], I submit amendments intended to be proposed by us, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments, together with an explanatory statement by me, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the amendments and explanatory statement by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments submitted by Mr. MYERS (for himself and other Senators) are as follows:

On page 267, line 3, after the word "be", insert "the sum of the following: (A)."

On page 267, line 5, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "(B) an amount equal to 1 percent of the amount computed under clause (A) multiplied by the number of years prior to 1951 in which $200 or more of wages were paid to such individual, and (C) an amount equal to one-half of 1 percent of the amount computed under clause (A) multiplied by the number of years after 1950 in which the sum of the wages paid to and the self-employment income derived by such individual was $200 or more."

On page 273, beginning with line 10, strike out all down to and including line 13 and insert in lieu hereof the following:

"(C) With respect to calendar years after 1950, the 1-percent addition provided for in section 209 (e) (2) of this act as in effect prior to the enactment of this section shall be one-half of 1 percent and shall be made with respect to any such year in which the sum of the wages paid to and the self-employment income derived by the individual was $200 or more."

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. MYERS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS ON INTRODUCING INCREMENT AMENDMENT TO SOCIAL SECURITY BILL

Mr. President, I am introducing, on behalf of myself and Senators LUCAS, BENTON, DOUGLAS, GREEN, HUMPHREY, KILGORE, LEHMAN, MCMAHON, MURRAY, PEPPER, and Senator THOMAS of Utah an amendment to the pending social security bill which will add an increment factor to the benefit formula set forth in the bill reported from the Senate Finance Committee. I do not intend at this time to make an elaborate explanation of the amendment, but I would like to observe that the benefit formulas set forth in both the House-approved bill and the recommendations of the Senate Finance Committee are decided improvements over the present law. Retirement benefits will be substantially increased under either provision.

The bill as it passed the House included a so-called increment in its formula. Under the House provision, the primary retirement benefit, as calculated by the formula, would be increased by one-half of 1 percent for each year the insured person has contributed to the program. In other words, for a person who worked in covered employment for 20 years this would mean that his primary insurance benefit on retirement would be increased by 10 percent, or one-half of 1 percent of increase for each year that he had contributed to the system.

It will be recalled that the benefit formula under the present law contains an increment factor of 1 percent. The Senate Finance Committee, however, in reporting the bill has recommended that the increment factor be dropped altogether.

I am in accord with the modifications which the Senate committee made in liberalizing eligibility requirements for retirement benefits and with the more liberal alternative suggestions for calculating average earnings on which benefits are determined, and I feel that it is inconsistent with the policy which these recommendations reflect to have dropped the increment altogether.

In effect, the use of the increment recognizes that the benefits which a working person shall receive on retirement should be related to the number of years he has contributed to the insurance fund. Yet, under the provisions of the Senate bill, it makes no difference whatsoever whether a given person has contributed 5 years or 40 years. His ultimate benefits depend solely upon his maximum average earnings and are in no way related to the number of years he has worked in covered employment.

Certainly, Mr. President, I believe a strong argument can be made for the psychological advantage of having a worker's benefits depend, in part at least, upon the number of years that the worker chooses to remain in covered employment. It preserves and promotes individual incentive because it emphasizes and reinforces the principle that the man who pays more in contributions receives more in benefits.

I know, Mr. President, that any liberalizing amendment to the pending bill necessarily raises the question: How much will this cost? If we use the assumptions adopted by the Finance Committee in determining the ultimate costs of the retirement insurance system, the inclusion of an increment as proposed in our amendment would increase the level-premium from 6.15 percent of payroll by about an additional 1 percent. In this connection, however, I should like to point out that if we alter the taxable wage base, of $3,000 in the Senate formula to $4,200, that change would result in a reduction of level premium cost of about two-tenths of 1 percent of payroll. Thus, if we consider together the increment amendment and the amendment to increase the wage base to $4,200, the net increase in cost is under 1 percent of payroll.

With our steadily expanding economy, bringing with it over the years a larger and larger national payroll, I am convinced that the ultimate cost of the insurance system will not, in fact, reach the level of 7 percent of payroll or more if we decide now to include the increment. I say this because I refuse to believe our economy is static. I believe our national payrolls will continue to increase. If they do increase, the insurance system will not cost nearly as much proportionately as we are led to believe by those who base their estimates of future cost on the assumption that our total national payroll will never be larger than it is today.

In closing, Mr. President, I should like to point out that our amendment differs somewhat from the increment provision contained in the House bill. We propose that an increment of 1 percent be paid for each year of covered employment prior to January 1, 1951—thus recognizing the rights which have accrued to those who have contributed to the pension fund during the period that an increment of 1 percent was part of the existing law. We propose further, that an increment of one-half percent annually be added for each year of coverage after January 1, 1951.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY], the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], I submit amendments intended to be proposed by us, jointly, to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments, together with an explanatory statement by me, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table, and, without objection, the amendments and explanatory statement by the Senator from Pennsylvania will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The amendments submitted by Mr. MYERS (for himself and other Senators) are as follows:

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. MYERS (for himself Mr. GREEN, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. KILGORE, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MORSE, Mr. NEELY, Mr. PEPPER, and Mr. THOMAS of Utah) to the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 268, line 24, after the words "closing date", insert "for the purposes of benefits under section 202."

On page 269, line 7, after "(B)", insert "for the purposes of benefits under section 202."

On page 269, line 16, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof "or, if the computation is being made for an individual who is entitled to disability insurance benefits with respect to a disability, in or after the month in which occurs his disability determination date for such disability."

On page 273, line 7, after the word "benefits", insert "or his disability determination date."

On page 273, between lines 15 and 16, insert the following:

"(E) For the purposes of this paragraph the term 'primary insurance benefit' includes disability insurance benefit."

On page 297, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

"DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

"SEC. 107. Title II of the Social Security Act is amended by adding after section 218 (added by sec. 106 of this act) the following:

"'PERMANENT AND TOTAL DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

"'Conditions of entitlement

"'SEC. 219. (a) (1) Every permanently and totally disabled individual (as defined in subsection (h)) who—

"'(A) has not attained retirement age,

"'(B) has filed application for disability insurance benefits,

"'(C) is insured for disability insurance benefits, and

"'(D) has been under a disability throughout his waiting period, shall be entitled to a disability-insurance benefit for each month, beginning with the first month after his waiting period in which he becomes so entitled to such insurance benefits and ending with the month preceding the first month in which any of the following occurs: he ceases to be a permanently and totally disabled individual, dies, or attains retirement age. Such individual's disability-insurance benefit for any month shall be equal to his primary insurance amount (as defined in sec. 215 (a)) for such month.

"'(2) The term "waiting period" means, with respect to the disability of any individual, the period beginning with the calendar month in which occurred his disability determination date (as determined under subsec. (c)) and ending at the expiration of the sixth calendar month following such month.

"'(3) An individual who would have been entitled to a disability-insurance benefit for any month had he filed application therefor prior to the end of such month shall be entitled to such benefit for such month if he files application therefor prior to the end of the sixth month succeeding such month; except that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply for purposes of determining a period of disability (as defined in subsec. (d)), or when a disability determination date occurred.

"'(4) No application for disability insurance benefits filed prior to 7 months before the first month for which the applicant becomes entitled to receive such benefits shall be accepted as an application for purposes of this section.

"'Determination of insured status

"'(b) An individual is insured for purposes of disability-insurance benefits if he had not less than—

"'(1) six quarters of coverage (as determined under section 213 (a) (2) during the 13-quarter period which ends with the quarter in which his disability determination date occurred; and

"'(2) twenty quarters of coverage during the 40-quarter period which ends with the quarter in which his disability determination date occurred.

In case such individual was previously entitled to disability insurance benefits, there shall be excluded from the count of the quarters in each period specified in paragraphs (1) and (2) any quarter any part of which was included in a period of disability unless such quarter is a quarter of coverage.

"'Disability determination date

"'(c) An individual's disability determination date shall be whichever of the following days is the latest:

"'(1) The day the disability began;

"'(2) June 30, 1951;

"'(3) The first day of the thirteenth month prior to the month in which he filed such application; or

"'(4) The first day of the first quarter in which he would be insured for disability insurance benefits with respect to such disability if he had filed application therefor in such quarter.

"'Determination of disability

"'(d) The Administrator shall make adequate provisions for determination of disability and redeterminations thereof at necessary intervals; he shall provide for such examination of individuals as is necessary for purposes of determining or redetermining disability and entitlement to benefits by reason thereof. An individual shall not be deemed a permanently and totally disabled individual unless he furnishes such proof of his disability as may be required by regulation; and unless the evidence in the case affirmatively establishes his disability. Reexaminations for redetermining the disability of an individual shall be made at periodic intervals except that the Administrator may dispense with such reexaminations of an individual after he has been entitled to disability benefits for 2 years upon finding that such examinations serve no further purpose. Official medical examinations may be performed in existing medical facilities of the Federal Government if services are readily available, and by impartial private physicians, clinics, hospitals, or other medical facilities designated for conducting such examinations. In the case of any individual submitting to an examination to determine his disability there may be paid (1) the necessary travel expenses (including subsistence expenses incidental thereto), either on a flat rate or a commuted basis, of such individual in connection with such examination, and (2) if the examination is made by an individual who is not an employee of the United States, there may be paid, either directly or through appropriate Federal or State departments, agencies, or commissions, the necessary fees, costs of tests, and necessary travel expenses, either on a flat rate or a commuted basis, for such examination. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year from the trust fund such amount as may be necessary for the purpose of this subsection.

"'Reduction of benefit

"'(e) (1) Where a benefit is payable to any individual under this section and a workmen's compensation benefit or benefits have been or are paid to such individual on account of the same disability for the same month, such individual's benefit under this section for such month shall, prior to any deductions under section 220, be reduced by one-half, or by an amount equal to one-half of such workmen's compensation benefit or benefits, whichever is the smaller.

"'(2) In case the benefit of any individual under this section is not reduced as provided in paragraph (1) because such benefit is paid prior to the payment of the workmen's compensation benefit, the reduction shall be made by deductions, at such time or times and in such amounts as the Administrator may determine, from any other payments under this title payable on the basis of the wages and self-employment income of such individual.

"'(3) If the workmen's compensation benefit is payable on other than a monthly basis (excluding a benefit payable in a lump sum unless it is a commutation of, or a substitute for, periodic payments), reduction of the benefits under this subsection shall be made in such amounts as the Administrator finds will approximate, as nearly as practicable, the reduction prescribed in paragraph (1).

"'(4) In order to assure that the purposes of this subsection will be carried out, the Administrator may, as a condition to certification for payment of any disability insurance benefit payable to an individual under this section (if it appears to him that there is a likelihood that such individual may be eligible for a workmen's compensation benefit which would give rise to a reduction under this subsection), require adequate assurance of reimbursement to the trust fund in case workmen's compensation benefits, with respect to which such a reduction should be made, become payable to such individual and such reduction is not made.

"'(5) For purposes of this subsection, the term "workmen's compensation benefit" means a cash benefit, allowance, or compensation payable under any workmen's compensation law or plan of the United States or of any State.

"'Termination of entitlement to benefits by Administrator

"'(f) In any case in which an individual has refused to submit himself for examination or reexamination in accordance with regulations of the Administrator, or has without good cause refused to take all steps necessary to obtain and to accept rehabilitation services available to him under a State plan approved under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act (29 U. S. C., ch. 4) after being directed by the Administrator to do so, the Administrator may find, solely because of such refusal, that such individual is not a permanently and totally disabled individual or that his disability (previously determined to exist) has ceased. The Administrator may find that an individual is not a permanently and totally disabled individual or that his disability (previously determined to exist) has ceased, if such individual is outside the United States and the Administrator finds that adequate arrangements have not been made for determining or redetermining such individual's disability.

"'Cooperation with agencies and groups

"'(g) The Administrator is authorized to secure the cooperation of appropriate agencies of the United States, of States, or of the political subdivisions of States and the cooperation of private medical, dental, hospital, nursing, health, educational, social, and welfare groups or organizations, and where necessary to enter into voluntary working agreements with any of such public or private agencies, organizations, or groups in order that their advice and services may be utilized in the efficient administration of this section.

"'Definitions of "disability" and "permanently and totally disabled individual"

"'(h) For the purposes of this title—

"'(1) the term "disability" means (A) inability to engage in any substantially gainful activity by reason of any medically demonstrable physical or mental impairment which is permanent, or (B) blindness; and the term "permanently and totally disabled individual" means an individual who has such a disability; and

"'(2) the term "blindness" means central visual acuity of 5/200 or less in the better eye with correcting lenses. An eye in which the visual field is reduced to 5 degrees or less concentric contraction shall be considered for the purposes of this paragraph as having a central visual acuity of 5/200 or less.

"'Definition of "period of disability"

"'(1) As used in this title, the term "period of disability" means, with respect to any individual, a period of one or more consecutive calendar months for each of which such individual was entitled to a disability insurance benefit and the six calendar months, preceding the first month of such period of one or more consecutive calendar months, except that if such individual ceases to be entitled to disability insurance benefits with respect to a disability because he dies or attains retirement age, the month in which such individual died or attained such age, as the case may be, shall also be included in the period of disability with respect to such disability.

"'Rehabilitation

"'(j) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year from the trust fund such amount as may be necessary to provide rehabilitation services for the rehabilitation of disabled individuals who are entitled to disability insurance benefits or serving a waiting period for such benefits, where it appears that such services may aid in enabling such disabled individuals to return to gainful work. Insofar as practicable, such services shall be provided through utilization of the services and facilities of State agencies (or corresponding agencies in the case of Territories or possessions) cooperating with the Federal Government in carrying out the purposes of the Vocational Rehabilitation Act, as amended (29 U. S. C., ch. 4). Agencies providing such services shall be reimbursed for the cost thereof.

"'DEDUCTIONS FROM DISABILITY INSURANCE BENEFITS

"'Events for which deductions are made

"'SEC. 220. (a) Deductions, in such amounts and at such time or times as the Administrator shall determine, shall be made from any payment or payments under this title to which an individual is entitled, until the total of such deductions equals such individual's benefit under section 219 for any month—

"'(1) in which such individual rendered services as an employee (whether or not such services constitute employment as defined in sec. 210) for remuneration of more than $50; or

"'(2) for which such individual is charged, pursuant to the provisions of subsection (c) of this section, with net earnings from self-employment (as determined pursuant to subsec. (d)) of more than $50; or

"'(3) in which such individual fails to submit himself for examination in accordance with regulations of the Administrator or

"'(4) in which such individual refuses without good cause to accept rehabilitation services available to him under a State plan approved under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act after direction by the Administrator to do so; or

"'(5) in which such individual is outside the United States if the Administrator finds that adequate arrangements have not been made for determining or redetermining the existence of the disability of such individual.

The Administrator may, if in his judgment it will aid in the process of rehabilitation of any individual, suspend or modify the application of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection for any month during which such individual is receiving rehabilitation services under a State plan approved under the Vocational Rehabilitation Act; except that the Administrator may not so suspend or modify the application of such paragraphs for any month after the eleventh month following the first month for which such suspension or modification was applicable.

"'Occurrence of more than one event

"'(b) If more than one event occurs in any one month which would occasion deductions equal to a benefit for such month, only an amount equal to such benefit shall be deducted. The charging of net earnings from self-employment to any month shall be treated as an event occurring in the month to which such net earnings are charged.

"'Months to which net earnings from self-employment are charged

"'(c) For the purposes of subsection (a) (2) of this section—

"'(1) If an individual's net earnings from self-employment for his taxable year are not more than the product of $50 times the number of months in such year, no month in such year shall be charged with more than $50 of net earnings from self-employment.

"'(2) If an individual's net earnings from self-employment for his taxable year are more than the product of $50 times the number of months in such year, each month of such year shall be charged with $50 of net earnings from self-employment, and the amount of such net earnings in excess of such product shall be further charged to months as follows: The first $50 of such excess shall be charged to the last month of such taxable year, and the balance, if any, of such excess shall be charged at the rate of $50 per month to each preceding month in such year until all of such balance has been applied, except that no part of such excess shall be charged to any month (A) for which such individual was not entitled to a benefit under this title, (B) in which an event described in paragraph (1), (3), (4), or (5) of subsection (a) occurred, or (C) in which such individual did not engage in self-employment.

"'(3) As used in paragraph (2), the term "last month of such taxable year" means the latest month in such year to which the charging of the excess described in such paragraph is not prohibited by the application of clauses (A), (B), and (C) thereof.

"'(4) For the purposes of clause (C) of paragraph (2), an individual will be presumed, with respect to any month, to have been engaged in self-employment in such month until it is shown to the satisfaction of the Administrator that such individual rendered no substantial services in such month with respect to any trade or business the net income or loss of which is includible for the purposes of this subsection in computing his net earnings from self-employment for any taxable year. The Administrator shall by regulations prescribe the methods and criteria for determining whether or not an individual has rendered substantial services with respect to any trade or business.

"'Special rule for computation of net earnings from self-employment

"'(d) For the purposes of this section, an individual's net earnings from self-employment for any taxable year shall be computed as provided in section 211 with the following adjustments:

"(1) Such computation shall be made without regard to the provisions of subsections (a) (2), (c) (1), (c) (4), and (c) (5) of section 211, and

"'(2) Such computation shall be made without regard to the provisions of sections 116, 212, 213, 251, and 252 of the Internal Revenue Code.

"'Penalty for failure to report certain events

"'(e) Any individual in receipt (on behalf of himself or another individual) of benefits subject to deduction under subsection (a) because of the occurrence of an event specified therein (other than an event described in paragraph (2) thereof) shall report such occurrence to the Administrator prior to the receipt and acceptance of a disability insurance benefit for the second month following the month in which such event occurred. If such individual knowingly fails to report any such occurrence, an additional deduction equal to that imposed under such subsection shall be imposed, except that the first additional deduction imposed by this subsection in the case of any individual shall not exceed an amount equal to 1 month's benefit even though the failure to report is with respect to more than 1 month.

"'Report to Administrator of net earnings from self-employment

"'(f) (1) If an individual is entitled to any disability insurance benefit during any taxable year in which he has net earnings from self-employment in excess of $50 times the number of months in such year, such individual (or the individual in receipt of such benefit on his behalf) shall make a report to the Administrator of his net earnings from self-employment for such taxable year. Such report shall be made on or before the fifteenth day of the third month following the close of such year, and shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the Administrator may by regulations prescribe. If the individual fails within the time prescribed above to make such report of his net earnings from self-employment for any taxable year and any deduction is imposed under subsection (a) (2) of this section by reason of such net earnings—

"'(A) such individual shall suffer one additional deduction in an amount equal to his benefit for the last month in such taxable year for which he was entitled to a disability insurance benefit; and

"'(B) if the failure to make such report continues after the close of the fourth calendar month following the close of such taxable year, such individual shall suffer an additional deduction in the same amount for each month during all or any part of which such failure continues after such fourth month'; except that the number of the additional deductions required by this paragraph shall not exceed the number of months in such taxable year for which such individual received and accepted disability insurance benefits and for which deductions are imposed under subsection (a) (2) by reason of such net earnings from self-employment. If more than one additional deduction would be imposed under this paragraph with respect to a failure by an individual to file a report required by this paragraph and such failure is the first for which any additional deduction is imposed under this paragraph, only one additional deduction shall be imposed with respect to such first failure.

"'(2) If the Administrator determines, on the basis of information obtained by or submitted to him, that it may reasonably be expected that an individual entitled to disability insurance benefits for any taxable year will suffer deductions imposed under subsection (a) (2) of this section by reason of his net earnings from self-employment for such year, the Administrator may, before the close of such taxable year, suspend the payment for each month in such year (or for only such months as the Administrator may specify) of such benefits payable to him; and such suspension shall remain in effect with respect to the benefits for any month until the Administrator has determined whether or not any deduction is imposed for such month under subsection (a). The Administrator is authorized, before the close of the taxable year of any individual entitled to benefits during such year, to request of such individual that he make, at such time or times as the Administrator may specify, a declaration of his estimated net earnings from self-employment for the taxable year and that he furnish to the Administrator such other information with respect to such net earnings as the Administrator may specify. A failure by such individual to comply with any such request shall in itself constitute justification for a determination under this paragraph that it may reasonably be expected that the individual will suffer deductions imposed under subsection (a) (2) of this section by reason of his net earnings from self-employment for such year'."

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. MYERS is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MYERS UPON INTRODUCING AMENDMENT TO SOCIAL SECURITY BILL TO PROVIDE DISABILITY INSURANCE FOR PERSONS PERMANENTLY AND TOTALLY INCAPACITATED

Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators GREEN, HUMPHREY, KILGORE, LEHMAN, MURRAY, MORSE, NEELY, PEPPER, and Senator THOMAS of Utah, I am introducing an amendment to restore the disability-insurance provisions to the social-security bill essentially in the form in which they were contained in the bill as it passed the House last year.

In proposing this amendment, I want to make it quite clear that I do not intend to detract from the merits of the bill as it was reported from the Senate Finance Committee. Speaking as a member of that committee, I am very well aware indeed of the conscientious fashion in which the committee worked out the provisions which were finally reported in the bill, and I want especially to pay tribute to the capable leadership of the Senator from Georgia, as chairman of the committee.

A great deal of the committee's attention was directed to the question of disability. A provision for insurance benefits to the disabled was incorporated in the original bill as it was reported from the House Ways and Means Committee, and as I have already indicated earlier, the disability feature was adopted by the House in passing the bill.

A majority of the Senate Finance Committee, however, after considerable discussion, voted to eliminate the House provision at this time.

Essentially, Mr. President, I think we can regard the problem of a person who becomes permanently and totally incapacitated prior to reaching the retirement age of 65 as simply another phase of the aging process. All of us realize, of course, that there are many persons who are perfectly capable physically and mentally of constructive and useful employment for many years after they have reached the age of 65. On the other hand, there are obviously those who age more rapidly, usually as a result of an accident or of some infirmity which incapacitates them earlier than the age of 65. Whatever may be the cause of the premature disability, the net effect upon that person and upon those dependent upon him is precisely the same as the problem which is faced by one forced into retirement at age 65 or thereafter.

The disabled person, incapable of further employment, faces a loss of income in precisely the same way as one who goes into retirement at 65. But the problem is more serious when we consider that a person who becomes disabled at, say, age 55, has 10 years to wait before he can possibly become eligible for retirement insurance benefits. Moreover, the incapacitated person of 55 ceases to contribute further to the insurance fund with the result that the retirement benefits he might ultimately receive will be reduced or, in many instances, wiped out altogether because he had not contributed a sufficiently long period of time to vest permanently his right to retirement insurance.

Most difficult of all for the 55-year-old worker, and I will continue to use him as an example here, is the bleak prospect of rehabilitation that lies ahead of him. While it is true that substantial strides have been made in recent years through rehabilitation work, there are many types of disability which are of such a serious nature that it is utterly impossible to fit the incapacitated person into any form of gainful employment from which he may derive an income.

Now there have been many arguments advanced against the principle of disability insurance. One of these most frequently heard is directed at the malingerer—that is, the employed person who simply grows tired of working and drums up some plausible ailment, which so he says, makes further employment impossible. Critics of disability insurance contend that once such a provision is brought into being there will be a wholesale exodus of lazy people from their present employment who will choose to sit and wait for a monthly disability check to come in.

What I believe the critics fail to see, Mr. President, is the fact that the disability insurance payments represent but a fraction of the average earnings which the disabled person received while fully employed. In most instances the payments will be but a third or less of the average income received by the incapacitated person while working. This, certainly, Mr. President, is a scant inducement to fraud. Moreover, the disability payments do not depend upon the number of dependents which the disabled person has. A man with a family to support will find no incentive here to abandon a job he is capable of handling in order to receive a payment monthly which is but a small fraction of what he is capable of earning.

But most important of all is my firm belief in the American people—my belief that they will not voluntarily give up to laziness. Those who assert that disability insurance will turn us into a Nation of malingerers and laggards have no faith in the fibre and the character of our people.

The amendment which we are submitting, Mr. President, differs in some respects from the provisions as set forth in the House bill. I do want to make it clear that I believe the House gave this problem the most thorough study and that its program was essentially sound. Further study of the House measure, however, indicates several points which can be clarified. I have included these clarifications and improvements in my amendment.

For one thing, it is not clear from the language of the House bill as to how great a burden of proof would be imposed upon the applicant for disability insurance. To my mind, the disabled person should certainly be required to carry the burden of proving his incapacity. This is certainly a necessary safeguard and a just one. The incapacitated person cannot merely contend that he has, for example, an aching back, and thus is no longer able to work. His disability must be such that it can be demonstrated by clear medical proof—medical proof that the disability is permanent and total and of such a nature that he is incapable of any type of work, not just his usual job. A finding would be required which would have to show that the individual has no residual work capacity which would permit him to earn a regular living.

To be eligible for benefits, the worker must have been in covered employment for at least 5 of the 10 years preceding the disability, and, in addition, he must have worked in covered employment for at least half of the 3-year period immediately preceding disability. Benefits would become payable only after a 6-month waiting period and even then, only in an amount sufficient to give a minimum of security.

The amendment also provides that a person who had received disability payments prior to the age of 65 would be transferred automatically to the ordinary retirement pension on reaching age 65.

The argument is often made that this proposal requires further study, and we often hear that it would be impossible to administer disability insurance objectively and efficiently. Both of these arguments fly squarely into the face of our long-standing experience with hundreds of disability programs—both public and private—which are today administered successfully in every State in the Union.

Disability provisions are found in retirement programs enacted by Congress for Government employees and railroad workers; States and the Federal Government have long administered disability programs under workmen's compensation laws. And, of course, we cannot ignore the long and successful experience gained under programs for disabled veterans.

I think it was quite fully developed in the hearings before the committees of the House and Senate that the disability problem is one of extreme gravity. This certainly is conceded even by those who do not favor the disability insurance principle as the best means of meeting the need. It is estimated that some 2,000,000 persons in our working population who are below age 65 are chronically disabled.

A substantial segment of this group are today cared for by existing public measures—primarily local relief programs—and it is quite generally agreed that the programs now in existence are inadequate to meet the needs of disabled workers with families. There is agreement generally among those who favor and oppose disability insurance that this problem can only be met through some form of public program, and that governmental machinery must be established to provide income maintenance, and furthermore, to assist in rehabilitating as many disabled people as possible.

Those who object to the principle of Federal disability insurance contend that the problem can best be met through public-assistance programs—direct relief grants—supplemented to some extent by private disability insurance.

Thus, Mr. President, it seems to me that those who argue against disability insurance on the ground that lazy people will misrepresent their physical conditions are, at the same time, admitting that it is perfectly all right to support such people under local relief programs. This, to me, is a curious contradiction. However, as I have indicated, I have a sufficient faith in the integrity of the American people to believe that they will work whenever they can find work, that they will do the best they possibly can to enjoy all of the good things of the American way of life which they can possibly earn for themselves. I see no inducement to malingerers in order to get a disability insurance check which is but a small fraction of their earning capacity or to quit work in order to receive relief payments under some local program.

In connection with private disability insurance, I should like to remark that, while such insurance is available of course, these policies are most circumscribed in their operation. They are, for the most part, limited to a small specified list of risks, usually those which might be encountered, say, in a given industrial situation or something of the sort. Moreover, they are expensive and well beyond the means of low-income families. Perhaps the most serious shortcoming of virtually every private disability insurance system is the fact that the limited extent of their coverage fails to provide protection for some of the most common causes of permanent disability. This becomes apparent when you consider that 9 out of 10 accidents which result in a permanent incapacity are not work-connected. Thus, workmen's compensation laws are of no assistance whatsoever where the disability is not work-connected.

A very essential part of any disability insurance program involves the question of rehabilitation work. That is, through the operation of programs which assist the incapacitated person in adapting himself to some form of useful employment from which he may earn a livelihood. Our amendment adds a feature not found in the House bill in this regard. We are proposing to provide additional assistance to State and local governments which will enable them to amplify their existing rehabilitation facilites. Thus, it is not contemplated that the Federal Government will maintain and operate rehabilitation services as such, but rather, we feel that it is in the best interest to have the rehabilitation programs developed and operated on State and local levels. We do recognize, however, that few if any State rehabilitation programs have yet developed to the level that they are today adequate to meet the needs of their disabled populations.

We propose that this assistance to the States in enlarging their rehabilitation facilities should be made available from the insurance fund by earmarking a part of the fund for this purpose. But, I repeat, our fundamental intention here is to permit States and local governments to develop rehabilitation services to meet their particular needs and we are merely using the mechanism of the trust fund to give them some additional help in expanding their services.

In my discussion thus far I have sought to outline the provisions of our amendment and to set forth in a very general way some of the supporting reasoning behind it. This discussion is far from complete. Those Members of the Senate who are familiar with the recommendations of the Senate Advisory Council on Social Security will recall that the Council, speaking through 15 of its 17 members, strongly advised adoption of the disability insurance provision. The Council in the opening paragraph of its discussion on disability insurance had this to say:

"Income loss from permanent and total disability is a major economic hazard to which, like old age and death, all gainful workers are exposed. The advisory council believes that the time has come to extend the Nation's social-insurance system to afford protection against this loss" (p. 69).

The council's report went on to observe:

"The council is strongly impressed with the seriousness of the problems created by permanent and total disability and with the social disadvantages of compelling the victims of this misfortune to depend upon public assistance. We believe that there is enough administrative ability in our Government organization to provide effective machinery for meeting this pressing social need" (p. 70).

I want to expand somewhat, Mr. President, on the council's observation that public assistance is scarcely the way in which the problem of permanent and total disability should be met. For one thing, as I have already stated, public-assistance programs are quite inadequate to handle this problem. A still more fundamental difficulty, I believe, is found in the fact that public assistance is not a self-supporting program. It is, instead, supported by general tax revenues. Too, as I mentioned in my opening remarks, disability prior to retirement age is simply another phase of the retirement problem. It is premature retirement brought about through some circumstance, generally accidental in nature, which removes a worker from gainful employment prior to the time persons of his age would normally expect to retire. Yet, the problem for the disabled person is just as acute as is that faced by a worker who retires at age 65 or thereafter and is without other income to maintain himself and his family. But, in one sense, this forced premature retirement as a result of disability may have more serious economic consequences than retirement at the normal retirement age. An unexpected disability may come well in advance of the time that a man who is planning for his ultimate retirement may have anticipated. And this I believe is particularly tragic, because disability frequently occurs at the peak of a man's earning capacity, at a time he may be completing the purchase of his home and just beginning to put aside money for his ultimate retirement.

So, in closing, Mr. President, I urge strongly that our amendment be adopted. I believe that a self-supporting insurance system is far and away preferable to the present method which depends exclusively on tax-supported public assistance for the support of our needy disabled. What we are doing, in short, by adopting this amendment, is merely lowering the retirement age for those forced from gainful employment as a consequence of permanent and total disability. I think that this is completely consonant with the concept of social insurance which is designed to provide minimum security for those who suffer income loss as a result of retirement—and I believe it is only consistent that we should recognize retirement may not be caused exclusively by reaching the legally prescribed age of 65.

Adoption of this amendment, Mr. President, would eradicate the shadow of insecurity and virtual destitution which threatens any working person today who might tomorrow find himself totally incapacitated and incapable thenceforth of providing for himself and his family. Social insurance is a dignified means of banishing that shadow. It is self-supporting. It does not carry with it the stigma of a relief hand-out. We have in this amendment a vehicle by means of which those covered by social security may by their contributions to the insurance fund spread the risk of economic tragedy which might befall them in the event of disability.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

George E. Sterling, of Maine, to be a member of the Federal Communications Commission for a term of 7 years from July 1, 1950 (reappointment).

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE CORPS OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In his capacity as a Senator, the Chair asks unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial about the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, today, June 16, being the anniversary of the corps, which has done such wonderful things for our country in both peace and war.

This editorial is entitled "Fighting Builders," and was written by Mr. Jack Carley, of the Commercial Appeal, of Memphis, Tenn., and published in the Sunday, June 11, 1950, edition of that paper.

It is one of the most beautiful tributes to the Corps of Engineers the Chair has seen in a long time, and he takes pleasure in having it printed in the RECORD. The Chair calls the attention of all Senators to the editorial and hopes they will read it.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FIGHTING BUILDERS

Maj. Gen. Richard Gridley was busily supervising construction of Bunker Hill's breastworks on the day General Washington appointed him Chief Engineer of the Grand Army (Continental). Gridley kept on building and made such a good job of it that Britain's crack grenadier guards quit after three unsuccessful assaults against the breastworks and what was behind them. This week the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, is pridefully observing its founding anniversary.

Since Gridley's day the Corps of Engineers has marched far, built much, and fought all comers. Along with that, it has produced such peerless military leaders as the South's incomparable Robert E. Lee and the present turbulent world's redoubtable Douglas MacArthur; and that's a reminder that great names and tough jobs have been common with the corps—George Goethals building the Panama Canal; Lew Pick bulldozing a Ledo road into vital usefulness; Bill Hoge directing the taking of the Remagen Bridge with the same ease he'd direct the building of a main-line levee; Don Noce's amphibian engineers putting combat troops ashore in 147 Southwest Pacific beachhead landings.

From Gridley's breastworks in 1775 to the killing drifts of the West's 1948 Operation Snowbound, the "pick-and-shovel soldiers" have helped make gallant American history with sweat and blood and calloused hands. What's written into so fine a record is as imperishable as it has been brave.

We started to felicitate old friends. Somehow it seems more fitting just to say, "Thanks, soldier—and good going."

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a statement prepared by me and a proclamation by the Governor of Mississippi commemorating the one-hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the United States Corps of Engineers.

There being no objection, the statement and proclamation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It was a fortunate circumstance that our first great general was an engineer. It was just 175 years ago today that a request of General George Washington was acted upon by the Continental Congress and the Corps of Engineers created.

The Corps consisted of a chief and two assistants and their first job was to throw up the defenses at Bunker Hill; and, their second, to put aside shovels and join in the fighting.

The Army engineers have been serving the National Military Establishment and the Nation down through the years to the present day. The Engineer Corps increased in size and importance through the years as the young Nation moved forward to its high destiny.

The Corps reached its pinnacle of strength in the recent war when 700,000 officers and enlisted men wore the famous castle insignia. It is interesting to note that more than 500,000 of these men were overseas in the thick of battle operations. The greatest single production feat of the war, the development of the atom bomb, was under the direction of the Corps of Engineers.

But, Mr. President, age and size and wartime achievement are not the basic fact about the engineers in their relation to our Nation's growth. The important thing is that they have been kept as active in the service of their country in years of peace as in war.

At every hand, in every State, there is some useful monument to their service, be it a giant dam, a magnificent building, or merely a surveyed boundary line. Year after year, at the bidding of the Congress, they have been entrusted with vast funds and important works. It is a unique tribute to their honesty and integrity that no serious reflection has ever been cast upon their trusteeship.

In my own State the engineers are held in highest esteem for having harnessed the great flood tides that roll down the Mississippi to the sea.

In recognition of their work and as a mark of the people's appreciation, the Governor of Mississippi, the Honorable Fielding Wright, has caused to be issued a proclamation commemorating this one-hundred and seventy-fifth birthday of the Corps of Engineers.

It reads as follows:

"PROCLAMATION

"Whereas June 16 marks the one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, by the Continental Congress; and

"Whereas this body of trained engineers has, through great courage and resolute spirit, crossed the seas and bridged the rivers to reach our enemies in time of war; and

"Whereas through their civil works program as authorized by the Congress, the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, has improved the Nation's harbors for world trade and harnessed rivers for protection against floods; and for the extension and advancement of water-borne commerce; and

"Whereas the activities of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, both in peace and war have been of great benefit to this Nation:

"Now, therefore, I, Fielding L. Wright, Governor of the State of Mississippi, do hereby proclaim the day of June 16, 1950, to be Engineers Day and do urge the citizens of the State of Mississippi to pay homage to their past accomplishments, to their mighty war efforts, and pledge our support to their progressive and constructive works during our years of peace.

"In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the State of Mississippi to be affixed, this the 2d day of June 1950.

"F. L. WRIGHT,
"Governor."

ELKS FLAG DAY CELEBRATION ADDRESS BY SENATOR MARTIN

[Mr. KEM asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by Senator MARTIN at the Elks Flag Day celebration at Lancaster, Pa., on June 14, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

REPORT ON COFFEE BY THE GILLETTE COMMITTEE

[Mr. GILLETTE asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD Hanson's Latin-American letter dated June 7, 1950, containing a special memorandum dealing with the report on coffee, of the Gillette committee which appears in the Appendix.]

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION — ARTICLE FROM THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION MAGAZINE

ANALYSIS OF THE ECA PROGRAM

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the most recent reports on the recovery of western Europe under the impetus of our economic assistance reveal that industrial production in the Marshall-plan countries continued to increase in the first quarter of 1950.

By the last quarter of 1949 the statistics revealed that the ECA nations, excluding western Germany, were producing at a rate of 29 percent above prewar. The latest figures indicate new high marks in this area. Furthermore, the current agricultural reports indicate that the prospects in agricultural production exceed last year, and 1949 was an exceedingly good crop year in Europe.

The significance of these reports raises serious questions as to what we may expect to achieve during the next year with our foreign aid.

I am concerned as to whether the economic recovery we have helped achieve has not been the restoration of the same old nationalistic economic pattern in Europe. I am gravely concerned as to whether the pattern of recovery we have been aiding with our dollars will not serve to defeat the more important objectives we seek.

We will soon have before us a most difficult task in determining the amount of funds we shall appropriate for continued Marshall-plan aid. In view of the present record it would appear that we must devote the remainder of the ECA program to the achievement of European economic integration, removing trade barriers and eliminating high-cost producers. It is most difficult to determine the cost of doing these things.

The staff of the Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation of which I am chairman has prepared a study entitled "An Analysis of the ECA Program" which points up most of these problems very objectively. I believe it will be of assistance to every member of this body in resolving some of the issues involved in determining the new appropriation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this study be printed in the record as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN ANALYSIS OF THE ECA PROGRAM

(This study is passed on to the Congress by the committee not because the committee endorses the contents of the study but because it believes the discussion which it contains of the issues involved will be helpful to all Members of Congress in their study of pending legislation on foreign aid.)

PURPOSE OF THIS STAFF STUDY

This analysis has been prepared to aid Members of the Senate and House of Representatives in their study of the foreign aid program for the fiscal year 1950–51.

Since the summer of 1947, when Secretary of State Marshall made the address at Harvard which led to the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, the situation in Europe has changed perceptibly, the scope of United States assistance to Europe has been broadened, and there have been almost 2 years of operating experience by the Economic Cooperation Administration. These circumstances suggest the desirability of reexamining the basic approach to the supplying of economic assistance as set forth in Public Law 472 of the Eightieth Congress and amended by Public Law 47 of the Eighty-first Congress, in the light of these new factors and of the administrative experience which is now available.

The Joint Committee on Foreign Economic Cooperation has, since its organization, maintained a staff which has been carrying on the function assigned to it in section 124 of Public Law 472 of making "a continuous study of the programs of United States economic assistance to foreign countries, and to review the progress achieved in the execution and administration of such programs."

This report is, in a sense, a byproduct of the work of the staff rather than a compilation of its studies. It is passed on to the Congress by the committee, not because the committee endorses the contents of the report, but because it believes the discussion which it contains of the issues involved will be helpful to all Members of Congress in their study of pending legislation on foreign aid.

The analysis prepared by the staff of the committee follows:

NECESSITY FOR CONTINUING FOREIGN ECONOMIC ASSISTANCE

The following analysis is based on the assumption that a program of foreign economic assistance will be continued. This assumption appears to be justified not only by the commitments already made to the participating countries by the United States, but also by the fact that most of the major maladjustment which have handicapped Europe since the war still remain. That is:

In spite of the unexpected progress of European recovery, the people of Europe still suffer from war-induced poverty.

The separation of western from eastern Europe by the iron curtain has disrupted the flow of raw materials and of manufactured articles and the consequent reorientation of western Europe in world commerce has as yet hardly begun.

The danger that Communist minorities may seize control of the governments of certain important western European states, while diminished from what it was in 1948, still remains.

There is reason to believe that basic factors which were making the industrial and commercial structure of Europe obsolete before the war persist, and must be either counteracted or compensated if Europe is to perform the military and political role which United States foreign policy contemplates. In particular it appears unlikely that Europe can ever regain its place as the workshop and banker for Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

In view of these fundamental problems which remain unsolved, it is assumed that it is in the interest of the United States temporarily to keep the countries of Europe which cooperate with the United States from bearing the full impact of their predicament.

This report is, therefore, concerned with possible alterations in the United States approach to the problem of foreign aid in the light of the realities of 1950, while accepting the existence of such a program as an essential element of United States foreign policy.

NATURE OF LEGISLATIVE ACTION INVOLVED

Although the perspective in which the program for economic cooperation is viewed in 1950 differs in a number of important respects from that of 1947–48, it is not believed that there is any need for redrafting the basic legislation.

This report calls attention to only seven aspects of the foreign-aid program which appear to justify careful study by the Congress in the light of current conditions and the possibility is indicated of dealing with these matters by means of five legislative changes.

The seven aspects of the European-aid program justifying careful study are—

1. The problem of the economic unification of Europe.
2. American private investment abroad.
3. The procurement of strategic materials.
4. Control of trade with the iron-curtain countries.
5. Europe as a market for United States exports.
6. Relation of the ECA to foreign military assistance and point 4 programs.
7. Advantages of revision of basis for appropriation.

The five legislative changes would deal with the following matters:

1. The authorization for the appropriation would divide the total into specified sums to be used for designated purposes.
2. A corporation would be authorized which would function as an international RFC.
3. Legislation outside the foreign assistance program is suggested to eliminate uncertainties which handicap the procurement of strategic materials.
4. The usefulness of an amendment to Public Law 472, section 117 (d) (80th Cong., 2d sess.) to strengthen the control of trade with the iron-curtain countries is indicated.
5. The advantage of an amendment making the ECA Administrator a member of the National Security Council is pointed out.

An analysis of these problems and proposals follows.

THE PROBLEM OF ECONOMIC UNIFICATION OF EUROPE

In recent weeks growing attention has been centered on the problem of the economic unification of Europe. The evidence currently available seems to indicate that although the reconstruction of European manufacturing capacity has been accomplished with surprising rapidity, the result has been the establishment of an industrial pattern which is much closer to the prewar normal than to the hoped-for objective of a new and unified Europe.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 as amended (sec. 102 (a)) declares it "to be the policy of the people of the United States to encourage the unification of Europe * * *" and refers to "the advantages which the United States has enjoyed through the existence of a large domestic market with no internal trade barriers * * *." This policy appears to have been adopted primarily because of the belief that the countries of western Europe could not be expected to defend and support themselves in the postwar world if they reverted to the nationalistic economic structures which had existed before the war. It seems to be clear that the foreign assistance program was not aimed at the restoration of the prewar economic pattern of western Europe but that, instead, the object was to assist in a substantial remodeling of European industry and commerce with the expectation that only if this occurred would Europe be able to stand on its own feet.

The unsatisfactory situation which remains with regard to freeing intra-European trade is indicated by the continued exhortations of Administrator Paul Hoffman to the participating countries to reduce and eliminate trade barriers and currency controls.

The following examination of specific situations suggests that the efforts of the Economic Cooperation Administration to date have not served to clear a road which can now be readily followed to the desired objective. Instead, it appears that the lesson to be derived from the ECA's experience is that such serious obstructions have been encountered that the economic unification of Europe can be attained only if a somewhat different approach is made to the problem.

In many respects the multiplicity of import quotas and exchange restrictions which characterize the European economy today should be regarded as symptoms of a disease rather than as a disease in itself. As long as countries are consuming more than they produce, spending more than their revenue, and maintaining uneconomical industries in order to keep workmen from losing their jobs, they are forced to impose restrictions on the movement of goods and currency.

To blame participating governments for their refusal to remove such controls while these internal maladjustments persist is comparable to blaming a patient suffering from an organic ailment for running a fever.

In this report emphasis has been placed on the unification of European industry rather than upon the obstacles to trade. Particular attention is given to the rebuilding of the European steel industry since the war, since it is believed that the record of this industry indicates with unusual clarity the problems involved.

The ECA program for the European steel industry

The ECA has authorized the expenditure of $167,399,000 on European steel-mill projects up to December 31, 1949. Additional ECA dollars have been spent on the European steel industry for items which have not been recorded on a project basis. These steel-project dollars have been divided among countries as follows:

Austria	$17,971,000
Belgium	5,767,000
France	64,934,000
Italy	25,497,000
Netherlands	23,500,000
United Kingdom	29,730,000
Total	167,399,000

It is generally agreed that the most revolutionary development in the steel manufacturing process of the last 50 years is the continuous rolling mill. This equipment was developed in the United States and permits the reduction of a steel billet to a sheet, by passing from one machine to another in sequence rather than being passed and repassed through the same machine as previously done. The new process cuts labor costs substantially, but a continuous mill must produce very large quantities to be economical. All of the large producers of sheets in America have such mills and it is generally accepted that no steel producer can compete in sheet production either in Europe or America without such a mill. Only the United Kingdom and Germany had continuous mills in Europe before the war—one each—and the German mill has been shipped to Russia as reparations.

As a consequence of this situation, there was great interest in building continuous mills in Europe after the war and, since the equipment is obtainable only in the United States, dollar expenditures were involved.

Of the ECA authorizations set forth above, $137,409,000 has gone to companies which are building continuous mills, being distributed as follows:

Country	Company	Dollars [1]
Austria	Vereinigte Oesterreichische Eisen- und Stahlwerke Aktien Gesellschaft (VOEST).	$10,883,000
Belgium	S. A. Metalurgique d'Esperance Lengdoz	2,585,000
France	Union Siderurgique du Nord de la France (USINOR)	12,074,000
	Societe Lorraine de Laminage Continu (SOLLAC)	49,360,000
Italy	Alti Fornie Acciaierie d'Italia (ILVA), controlled by Societa Finanziaria Siderurgica p. a. (FINSIDER).	12,007,000
Netherlands	Koninklijke Nederlandsche Hoogovens en Staalfabricken N. V.	23,500,000
United Kingdom	Steel Co. of Wales, Ltd	27,000,000

[1] The continuous mills themselves cost less than these sums. These are the dollars going to projects which include such mills.

Attention is directed to the geographical location of these projects. Presumably steel manufacturing in a unified Europe would be centered in a few large plants in the lowest cost locations to serve the one big market. Considering the location of Europe's coal and iron deposits, together with the accessibility of transportation facilities, it might be expected that most of the steel plants to supply the new Europe would be found in Germany, the United Kingdom, and France, which have always been the leaders in European steel manufacturing.

Furthermore, it should be noted that the larger countries of Europe have traditionally regarded the possession of steel plants as essential to their national defense. Consequently, the fact that steel has been manufactured in Austria for 100 years does not necessarily indicate that steel production in Austria can be justified on purely economic grounds. It must be recognized that the industry got its start when the Austro-Hungarian Empire was a world power and a major military force. In Italy, Mussolini expanded the steel industry substantially as part of a military program. It does not follow, therefore, that it is desirable to reequip the existing Italian steel industry with the most modern machinery in an effort to keep the plants going. It is possible that the best way to bring about a unified European economy would be for the ECA to use its funds to lighten the impact on the Italian economy of closing down most of Italy's steel plants.

Perhaps the most striking feature of the ECA program for erecting continuous mills in Europe is the fact that Germany will have no continuous mill at all in spite of the fact that the Ruhr is generally regarded as possessing more natural advantages for the manufacture of steel than any other location in Europe.

The consensus of European steel makers and government officials appears to be that no more continuous steel mills should be built in Europe for the present than have already been authorized by the ECA. If this position is maintained, the Ruhr with all its natural advantages apparently will be barred from competing in the world market for steel sheets because it is deprived of up-to-date equipment, while other higher-cost producers participate in this production to the detriment of Europan steel fabricators who are trying to regain a substantial place for their products in world markets.

ECA funds have not necessarily been wasted

The point to this description of the ECA program for the European steel industry is not that the ECA money has been wrongly invested; it is merely that the ECA program for steel so far has been dominated by considerations at variance with the economic unification of Europe. The biggest reason why the ECA steel program has turned out the way it has appears to be that short-run national political considerations have had to be given priority over long-run objectives of unification. For instance, in countries such as Italy and Austria where the Communist menace has always been serious, it has not been felt safe to tamper very much with the existing economic pattern, because of the impact of change on employment and on national pride. Cetrainly it would be futile to take action toward integrating the Italian economy into that of a unified Europe if such action caused a friendly Italian Government to be replaced by a Communist government.

Nevertheless, it seems clear that building steel mills in locations which do not conform to a pattern of low-cost production for a unified Europe actually retards the attainment of that objective. The new mills are big. The fixed charges are heavy. The various governments which have sponsored these plants will presumably go to great lengths to keep them operating. It is unlikely that the Austrain Government will ever permit low-cost steel sheets to be imported while its own new sheet mill stands idle.

Steps necessary for integration of European steel industry

An examination of the current status and problems of the European steel industry indicates the difficulties with which the ECA must grapple if it is to carry forward the announced policy of the United States to unify Europe. To attain this objective it would appear to be necessary to determine which, in western Europe, are the lowest-cost locations for steel production; to take the action necessary to assure that plants of the optimum size and efficiency will be erected there (or old ones modernized); and, finally, to make sure that market restrictions and production subsidies are removed so that the low-cost plants are assured of an opportunity to compete for a share of the new and large European domestic market.

In selecting locations either of two general approaches is possible, or some combination of them. One would involve the formation of a master plan for Europe, by a government agency, based on exhaustive analysis of cost factors submitted by various countries and firms which desire to construct plants. At the other extreme would be the removal of all subsidies, restrictions, and protections which impede the flow of goods and capital across national boundaries, which should result in the gravitation of private capital investment in steel to the most favorable sites as a result of competitive forces.

It should be noted that either of these approaches requires some sort of higher European government with sufficient power to enforce decisions which are against the national interests of individual countries. The formulation of a master plan based on production efficiency could not be done on the basis of debate and compromise. The countries with the natural advantages should get the plants and the others should not. If national subsidies, barriers, and protections are to be removed effectively, there must be an authority which can direct the nations of Europe to alter their tariffs, tax programs, and to accept decisions which will lead to closing down factories and creating unemployment. Any other procedure would result in a production pattern based on keeping as many people in business as possible and on causing a minimum disruption of the old industrial structure, rather than upon considerations of producing at the lowest possible costs so that Europe may be able to compete in the markets of the world.

Comparable problems exist in getting the plants built. Theoretically, at least, a decision to concentrate the steel manufacturing for all of Europe in three countries should not mean that only the skilled labor, management, and private capital of those countries should participate in the industry. If it should be decided that future steel production in Italy was uneconomical, it should be possible for Italian plant owners, managers, engineers, and skilled laborers to compete for a place in the bigger and better steel industry in its new locations. To bring this about would require the ability of a higher governmental authority to formulate and enforce policies upon the participating nations.

The transformation of western Europe into one big market for steel instead of a group of Nation-wide markets would require abandonment of the concept that each country should have the right to manufacture at least its own domestic requirements for itself. Furthermore, each country which now has a steel industry regards that industry as an element in its national defense program. The existence of the Atlantic Pact and the military-assistance program presumably will make each member nation more willing to adjust its industrial structure in the direction of an integrated Europe than would otherwise be the case. Nevertheless, the bringing about of an integrated steel industry in Europe will clearly require controls broader in scope than have usually been thought of as part of an economic program.

Unification of European steel production would cause unemployment and major readjustments

If steel production in Europe were to be concentrated in a few large-scale operations, it would be necessary for plants to close down in a number of countries. As a result, local industries which were dependent on local steel production would also be curtailed, power supply and consumption would be altered, workmen would be unemployed, and cities would lose population. Presumably no participating country could face such readjustments unless the impact could be cushioned by Marshall-plan aid. The development of programs for integrating industries would, consequently, involve preparing plans for making compensatory economic changes in the countries which were to lose factories. This type of programing is complex and it would require years to put such a program into effect.

It may be concluded, therefore, that the unification of European industry cannot be accomplished by 1952 and that a significant index of ECA progress in this direction will not be its report of projects approved for building new factories but, instead, of programs developed for closing down high-cost industries and for cushioning the impact of this action.

Relation of European colonies to European unification

The fact that several of the ECA countries in Europe are the centers of colonial empires inevitably conflicts with the unification of Europe. There is a tendency in such cases for the parent country to offer better prices for the products of its dependencies than the dependencies can obtain elsewhere (France pays more for Martinique sugar than Martinique can get any place else) and then to require the dependency to favor the parent country in its purchases of manufactured goods. As a result, production of both the parent country and the dependency has been sheltered and an artificial economic structure has been developed. To integrate European industries generally would mean pulling the props not only from under important segments of European industry but also from under the economies of the colonies. The consequences would be far reaching.

Conclusions as to industrial unification

1. The inevitable conflicts between the requirements for economic integration and short-run, national political considerations; the magnitude, complexity, and the consequences of the adjustments necessary; and the need for creating a higher governmental agency capable of carrying out such a program, all indicate that substantial results in this field can only be obtained over a relatively long period.

2. The nature of the actions necessary for the formulation and execution of a program of economic unification seems to require an accompanying political unification of Europe and the transfer of certain segments of sovereignty to this higher government if the desired results are to be obtained. A body such as the Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC) which limits itself to the economic field and which operates under a unanimity rule, inevitably must fail as an agency for integrating the European economy. Its decisions are necessarily compromises which all members can accept with a good deal of "I will not vote against your program for fear you will vote against mine" beneath the surface. Furthermore, the member nations are not willing to entrust to it issues which involve national defense or risk the political future of their governments.

It seems clear that it will be impossible to advance much beyond the present stage of economic unification without a new approach in organization and control.

3. The immediate bottleneck retarding the industrial integration of Europe is not money, and there is no assurance that further capital investments in European industry will promote unification. European manufacturing facilities have already been restored to a point where they are producing more than they did before the war. What is needed next is a new pattern and new institutions to develop and execute the necessary program. Until these political and organizational problems are much nearer to being overcome than at present, capital can only be invested on a nationalistic basis.

Additional expenditures by the United States for industrial construction should be entered into with extreme caution and only after a new approach has been developed to assure that the new plants will promote economic integration.

AMERICAN PRIVATE INVESTMENT ABROAD

One aspect of the ECA program which has been spectacularly devoid of results is the effort to encourage private investment by Americans in the ECA countries. After 1¾ years of operation with $300,000,000 available to guarantee such investments the first year and $150,000,000 available the second year, there have been 15 such guaranties made totaling $3,968,008. Furthermore, there are only 33 applications pending involving $38,591,958. This does not include guaranties to informational media which are limited to a total of $10,000,000 and which involve different issues.

The guaranties to American investors apparently were included in the Foreign Assistance Act (Public Law 472, sec. 111 (b) (3), as amended) in the belief that, while initially the major part of the recovery program would have to be Government-financed, as European industry showed signs of revival American investors might supply capital and know-how to European industries to the advantage not only of the recovery effort, but also of the United States Treasury. The guaranties have been limited to assuring the American investor that he can convert his investment and the profits he may make on it into dollars during a 14-year period. That is, he receives no protection against commercial or political risks, but he is assured that he can convert what he may realize on his investment, during the life of the guaranty, into dollars. Such an arrangement has clearly not been attractive to American business.

It should be understood that the problem is not peculiar to the countries of Europe. The current discussion of the point 4 program for assistance to underdeveloped countries indicates that Americans are slow to make foreign investments in all parts of the world. There are several factors, apparently common to most foreign countries, which account for this reluctance.

Of primary importance is undoubtedly the existence of the cold war. The fact that Russia and the Cominform are avowed enemies of the American investor (capitalist) and are actively striving to destroy in all countries of the world those institutions and governmental processes on which the ownership of property depends, inevitably discourages private investment in most parts of the world, except in unusual circumstances.

Furthermore, the record of many foreign governments with regard to expropriation and discrimination makes Americans fear that they may be throwing good money after bad. Even after nearly 2 years of United States aid, certain European governments refuse to permit Americans more than a minority interest in any of their enterprises, discriminate against United States firms in the administration of their exchange and export-import controls, and postpone treaty negotiations necessary to protect American business interests.

In addition to the familiar and understandable effort of vested interests in a country to prevent encroachment by outsiders, there is a new element in the opposition by foreign governments to investment by Americans. In most of the countries of western Europe there is substantial political pressure in favor of public ownership of basic industries. The situation in the German Federal Republic is a case in point. There the Social Democrats are the second largest political party, particularly strong in the Ruhr, and are pledged to public ownership of the coal mines and the steel industry. In this they have the sympathy, if nothing more, of the British. Consequently, any suggestion that United States capital might be invested in the Ruhr is vigorously resisted by this group since they fear that it would be exceedingly difficult to oust American owners once they had gained a foothold. In Germany, Austria, and to a lesser extent other European countries, the ownership of major industries is unsettled due to problems of disposing of the property of Nazi owners and collaborators as well as other factors. Groups advocating a socialistic program are actively interested in postponing the settlement of these ownership issues in the hope that public ownership may ultimately result. In all such instances it would be essential that uncertainties of this nature be removed before Americans would be interested in investment, while at the same time any suggestion that participation by Americans in the industrial development of a country be encouraged encounters effective resistance from the Socialist groups who believe that such a step would defeat their programs.

Recognition must also be given to the fact that the policy of the United States Government, as manifested by the Department of State, is by no means clearly in favor of American private investment abroad. In response to the argument that one of the best means of building up world production, fostering unification, discouraging economic nationalism, and preventing wars would be active participation by United States businessmen in the ownership and management of industries throughout the world, the State Department emphasizes the danger of providing a basis for the Communist charges of Wall Street imperialism, the undesirability of interfering with the internal affairs of a sovereign country, and the importance of avoiding any antagonizing of the parties advocating public ownership. (Coalition governments might fall as a result.)

In spite of these obstacles and disadvantages, there would clearly be certain benefits to the American taxpayer if private investment abroad could be developed. The most obvious is the saving in cost. Every dollar made available to Europe would serve to alleviate the dollar shortage even if supplied by private enterprise in the hope of making a profit. Even under a Government guaranty program the cost would be less than an equivalent investment by the Government, except in the unlikely event that the United States would have to make good every project it guaranteed.

The value of private initiative, judgment, and know-how together with ability to select industrial reconstruction projects on the basis of their profit potentialities might be even more important advantages of the extension of private investment. European technology suffered a severe lapse during the war years. European business has never had the aggressive, competitive leadership that characterizes our own. Its entire philosophy is based on protection and regulation. Furthermore, war losses have irreparably limited the supply of executive manpower. American risk capital and American management could make a major contribution.

Conclusions as to private investment

1. There is no certainty that while the present cold war atmosphere persists any substantial foreign private investment by Americans can be brought about. The risks are almost unprecedented.

2. A major obstacle that should be cleared away before undertaking to broaden the guaranty program is the uncertainties concerning the policies and regulations of the governments concerned, including our own, toward such investment. Unless a participating government is willing to do everything in its power to assure American investors equal treatment with its own people, it seems undesirable to ask the American taxpayer to underwrite such undertakings. It is particularly important that the Government of the United States determine whether it really desires to promote private investment by Americans abroad as an integral part of our foreign policy. Any reservations on this point should be made clear before funds are appropriated.

3. It seems clear that few Americans feel themselves in a position to assume the military and political risks inherent in foreign investment under present conditions. It is believed by many that such investments would be made in significant amount if the United States Government broadened the existing guaranty program to underwrite the risks of war, expropriation, and discrimination. It is possible that some sort of insurance arrangement could be developed with premiums paid by the private investors. The British Board of Trade has done something of this kind. It is not certain that such an approach would work. Many investors are opposed to such a program on the ground that a guaranty program of this nature would necessitate so much bureaucratic programing and so many controls as to defeat its purpose. The only acceptable approach would be to try it with a limited appropriation.

It should be noted, however, that every dollar going to Europe helps narrow the dollar gap and that there is little reason to fear that dollars sent to Europe by American investors, even if later repaid out of the United States Treasury, would be less wisely disbursed than those expended under current programing procedures.

PROCUREMENT OF STRATEGIC MATERIALS

A third disappointment in the operation of the Marshall plan is its comparative failure to produce strategic materials.

Since its beginning, one of the objectives of the ECA program has been the procurement of strategic materials for the United States. As originally enacted, Public Law 472, section 115 (b) (5) provided that each participating country would agree to "facilitate the transfer to the United States" of materials in which we are deficient. Section 115 (b) (9) required that the countries agree to negotiate "a future schedule" of availabilities to the United States of scarce materials and to give to Americans "suitable protection for the right of access." Section 117 (a) directed the Administrator to use ECA funds to increase the production of materials in which the United States is deficient.

Because the results obtained in carrying out these provisions during the first year of ECA operation were so meager, Public Law 47, Eighty-first Congress, first session, added the following amendments:

"SEC. 115. (1) (1) The Administrator shall, to the greatest extent practicable, initiate projects for and assist the appropriate agencies of the United States Government in procuring and stimulating increased production in participating countries of materials which are required by the United States as a result of deficiencies or potential deficiencies in its own resources; and in furtherance of those objectives the Administrator shall, in addition to the local currency allocated pursuant to subsection (h), use such other means available to him under this title as he may deem appropriate.

"(2) In furtherance of such objectives and within the limits of the appropriations and contract authorizations of the Bureau of Federal Supply to procure strategic and critical materials, the Administrator, with the approval of the Director of such Bureau, shall enter into contracts in the name of the United States for the account of such Bureau for the purchase of strategic and critical materials in any participating country. Such contracts may provide for deliveries over definite periods, but not to exceed 20 years in any contract, and may provide for payment in advance of deliveries."

The ECA in its sixth report to Congress (quarter ending September 30, 1949, p. 60) indicates that progress in the strategic materials field "has been slower than anticipated." The record of ECA performance appears to support this judgment. In December 1948, the Chief of the ECA Strategic Materials Division announced that by the end of the first year of ECA operation (April 3, 1949) it was anticipated that $75,000,000 worth of strategic materials would have been procured. Against this estimate, the performance for 1 year and three-quarters (end of December 1949) has been a total expenditure equivalent to $48,455,505, all in counterpart funds. It was estimated also in December 1948, that $25,000,000 would be expended in the first year on long-range development projects. As of December 31, 1949 (1 year and three-quarters), only $6,072,000 has been spent for this purpose. At the end of 1949 ECA had available in its 5 percent counterpart fund, out of which strategic materials and United States foreign administrative expenses are financed, a total equivalent to $158,416,000. Past experience indicates that administrative expenses run about 16 percent of this amount, so that ECA has clearly not been able to spend the counterpart available for the strategic materials program.

Reasons for unsatisfactory progress

Although a number of administrative problems remain unsolved in connection with the procurement and development of strategic materials (the ECA cites such things as "method of channeling funds to the recipient company," "terms of repayment," "interest rates on money to be advanced," "security requirements," "fixing of a formula for determination of the value of metals turned over to the United States stock pile * * *" for example), there appear to be three primary difficulties which must be overcome if the program is to succeed:

First, the executive branch of the United States Government has not been able to agree upon a comprehensive program for the procurement and development of strategic materials.

Second, the ECA countries have tended to "drag their feet" in carrying out this program.

Third, the ECA has regarded the strategic-materials program as being somewhat in conflict with the main objectives of the recovery program and has not given it a very high priority.

Each of these points will be discussed in some detail.

Lack of comprehensive United States program

The United States has not yet been able to reconcile effectively the various conflicting interests which exist in the strategic materials field. When provisions concerning strategic materials were included in the Foreign Assistance Act, Congress apparently had in mind two major considerations. First, the United States in the postwar world is vulnerable with respect to certain materials, particularly minerals, partly because of the depletion of our own supplies during the war and partly because a number of materials which are not available in the United States have become of major importance for industrial production and for national defense.

Second, Congress appears to have been motivated also by the belief that the Marshall plan countries should do anything for the United States that they possibly could in return for the sacrifices America was making for them. This was not an idea that the dollar value of the materials received should be balanced against the dollar cost of foreign aid, but rather that perhaps the only field in which the United States was weak and Europe could help was that of deficiency materials, and that Europe should do what it could.

Up to now, the executive branch has not given concrete expression to these broad objectives nor translated them into a program for action.

The military interest in these materials is represented by the Munitions Board. Its basic approach is to stockpile critical items so as to assure adequate supplies for a 5-year war. Its interest is primarily concerned with the stockpile and is not directly interested in the development of new production. Furthermore, long-range economic considerations do not concern it very much. It is more interested in a high-cost source of supply close at hand than in a low-cost source involving a long ocean haul. This latter type of development might be of importance to the future of United States industry. In general, it has been the experience of the Munitions Board that it can get what it wants if it has enough money, and that the ECA is not vital to its operations.

American industry is by no means sure that a strategic-materials program is desirable. There is a strong feeling among a number of firms that a stockpiling program is undesirable because the existence of a stockpile constitutes a continuous threat overhanging the market. In addition, various high-cost mineral producers in the United States which were kept in operation during the period of war and postwar shortages are now closing down. They and their unemployed workmen strongly object to purchasing or developing foreign supplies of the commodities which they produce. Some of the major United States corporations with extensive experience in foreign operations, which are seriously concerned with the limited reserves of certain minerals remaining in the United States and which might be expected to take the initiative in a long-range development program to assure themselves of future supplies, are unwilling to do so because of the current risks of foreign investment. Consequently, there has been no effective leadership toward a strategic-materials program from American business.

The United States Government efforts in this direction have not been effectively coordinated. There is an interdepartmental committee, in which the several executive departments participate, which serves to reconcile conflicting interests. Nevertheless, there is no department which assumes responsibility for the problem in its entirety and which can be held accountable for shortcomings. Each Government agency looks after its own interests, but there is none which devotes itself to the broad problem visualized by Congress at the outset of the foreign-aid program.

ECA countries reluctant to supply materials

In general, it may be said that the countries of Europe think of their strategic-materials resources primarily in political and military terms and only secondarily in commercial terms. They recognize these resources as giving them increasing advantages in international bargaining and because the supplies are often found in the overseas territories, the strategic-materials problem is frequently mixed up with the complex and artificial colonial economy of the parent country.

A further difficulty in obtaining such supplies from Europeans is the traditional attitude of these countries toward the exhaustion of resources. It may be said that ghost towns are largely an American phenomenon. Europeans try (and usually succeed) in avoiding situations where the exhaustion of a mine means that labor and capital have to be uprooted and shifted to a new means of livelihood. Consequently, European ideas as to supplies currently available are usually substantially less than American judgment involving the same reserves.

Finally, in addition to these less tangible obstacles, the fact remains that on a strictly commercial basis most strategic materials can be sold for dollars, and the participating countries are reluctant to sell for less. To the extent that the ECA program is based on the use of counterpart funds, it is necessary to introduce additional considerations into negotiations in order to attain success.

Effects of ECA attitude toward program

In its strategic-materials program the ECA has always operated under a psychological handicap because it has felt that its main job was bringing about European recovery and that the aggressive action necessary to assure an adequate flow of strategic materials would interfere with its recovery objectives. This attitude has in part, apparently, reflected a belief that any compensation derived in this way would be so insignificant, as compared to the total outlay by the United States, that it was not worth the danger of giving support to the charges by the Communists that the Marshall plan was designed to give the United States control of the world's resources. The ECA has been unwilling to use pressure to get materials for the United States. It has defined availability so that only those strategic materials of which the participating countries as a group have a net surplus are eligible for ECA procurement. While this position is logically defensible, it must be recognized that the United States supply position would be better if the ECA had vigorously tried to obtain strategic commodities whenever it found a country with an exportable supply, without giving too much concern to other countries. Furthermore, although it might have made its loans contingent in certain cases on repayment in strategic materials, the ECA chose not to use this device which would have offered the dual advantages of putting pressure on the borrowing government to supply us the things we needed and of assuring that the United States would get some sort of return on the loan.

Nevertheless, the responsibility for the limited results in the strategic materials field cannot be attributed primarily to the ECA. At best, the ECA program gave the United States a valuable means to be used in getting and developing the materials we needed and were having trouble in acquiring. The ECA should not be expected to assume the job of reconciling the various conflicts as to what the United States really does want in this line, and then formulating a program to this end. If the United States had developed such a program, and the ECA failed to perform the functions assigned to it, it would deserve severe censure. As it stands, if Congress believes that the United States is still vulnerable as regards the availability of certain important materials it should direct its attention first to other executive departments in order to establish responsibility for developing a comprehensive program.

CONTROL OF TRADE WITH IRON CURTAIN COUNTRIES

A fourth case in which hopes reflected in the original Marshall-plan legislation have remained largely unfulfilled concerns the matter of preventing certain commodities from going from western Europe to Russia and its satellites.

Prior to the enactment of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 (Public Law 472, 80th Cong.), there was considerable attention in the congressional debate to the danger that commodities supplied by the United States to western Europe might find their way behind the iron curtain. The law as ultimately passed dealt with this matter by providing in section 117 (d) that "the Administrator is directed to refuse delivery insofar as practicable to participating countries of commodities which go into the production of any commodity for delivery to any nonparticipating European country, which commodity would be refused export licenses to those countries by the United States in the interest of national security."

It should be noted that this is a rather narrow provision if the real objective is to prevent items of military significance from going from western Europe to the Soviet area. It does not prevent the participating countries from shipping anything they want to the iron-curtain area as long as it is not made from ECA materials.

The ECA has never limited its activities in this field to trying to enforce strictly the letter of the law. It has tried instead to get the participating countries to enforce the same sort of restrictions on exports to the Soviet-dominated area that the United States maintains. This has involved trying to get the countries to accept our lists of prohibited and restricted commodities and to establish export control systems which would permit effective enforcement.

After nearly 2 years of operation the results obtained by ECA are disappointing. The participating countries have not as yet agreed to prohibit or limit the export to the iron-curtain countries of all of the items which the United States restricts. As a result, United States firms are still losing orders to foreign competitors which our own export regulations prevent our firms from filling.

Furthermore, while stressing the broader objective, the ECA has failed to obtain effective enforcement of the strict provisions of section 117 (d). A number of participating countries have export control systems which are admittedly of such a nature that they cannot tell whether or not products made of ECA materials have gone to iron-curtain countries.

The most serious situation with regard to control is found in the case of western Germany. Here investigations by the "watchdog committee" staff and by the Department of Commerce have indicated that the export-control procedure was inadequate and that the border control along the boundary of the Russian zone is not organized for effective customs control. The only action so far to correct these deficiencies has been for the Allied High Commission to instruct the German Government to take necessary action. In view of the numerous and complex administrative problems facing the German Federal Republic at present, it is unlikely that substantial progress will be made in this direction for several weeks. This matter becomes increasingly urgent as Germany apparently is able to produce more items of military significance than any other European country.

A further major difficulty in bringing shipments from the ECA countries to eastern Europe under effective control is the so-called in transit trade, particularly through the free ports of Europe. The practice has been for the United States and the participating countries to allow prohibited and restricted items to move to other countries within the group rather freely. This has made it possible for products to be reconsigned to an iron-curtain country after being shipped from the country of origin to another participating country. This problem could be solved if each country would vigorously police all shipments where changes in consignee were involved.

The problem confronting Congress is the fact that after nearly 2 years the wholehearted cooperation of the European countries receiving American aid in controlling east-west trade has not been obtained. It presumably could be obtained if section 117 (d) were strengthened by directing the Administrator to withhold economic assistance from all countries which do not satisfy him that they have put into effect controls which prevent shipments of goods to the iron-curtain area, which the United States itself does not permit.

In this connection it must be recognized that this problem might fall more directly into the sphere of the North Atlantic Treaty and its administration. Nevertheless, certain countries receive economic assistance which do not participate in the foreign military assistance program. The fundamental question then remains as to whether American dollars should go to countries which do not carry out our policies concerning trade with the Soviet-dominated countries.

EUROPE AS A MARKET FOR UNITED STATES EXPORTS

In addition to problems of the foregoing type—problems which were recognized at the time of passage of the original ECA legislation and which still remain to be dealt with effectively—new ones have come into being that could not be foreseen 2 years ago.

The Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 was enacted in an atmosphere of shortages which led to inclusion in it of a variety of provisions to limit United States exports as a protection to the American economy. The situation has now changed so that American businessmen are actively seeking markets for their products both at home and abroad. In the field of agriculture we are embarking on a program of acreage restrictions because we are threatened with surpluses of a number of commodities.

This basic change makes it desirable to consider whether or not the ECA program should be modified to conform to the new situation.

There have been frequent complaints from American firms with long experience in the export field that the Marshall plan has seriously injured their business. Against this situation, however, must be balanced the fact that most of the ECA dollars have been spent in the United States with the result that exports to Europe apparently have been substantially greater than would have been the case with no foreign-aid program. Furthermore, it must be realized that many American exporters whose sales to ECA countries have been curtailed on the grounds that their products were not basic necessities, would have suffered in the same way without the Marshall plan as a result of drastic economies made necessary by the economy programs of countries without dollars.

The large and fundamental grievance which United States exporters have against the ECA program is that, as it now operates, it encourages the development of new sources of supply outside the dollar area which are likely to usurp permanently the position of the United States in the European market.

In analyzing this condition, it is necessary to recognize that western Europe has to make drastic changes in its industrial and trade patterns. (The largest single reason for this is the loss of eastern Europe as a market and as a source of foodstuffs and raw materials.) The basic reason for the Economic Cooperation Administration has been to cushion the impact of these necessary readjustments. The ECA program cannot be justified in terms of the economic benefits it confers on the United States. Any way we look at it, it involves economic sacrifice by the United States in order to attain desired political and military objectives.

Although the program is still very costly, fewer taxpayers' dollars would be required if the economic structure of Europe were altered so that it could produce for itself things formerly exported to it from the United States. Our dollar outlay would be further reduced if we accepted imports from Europe of items we formerly produced for ourselves.

The problem of the Congress is to evaluate the advantages of dollar savings made in this way against the impact on the United States economy of the loss by American producers of certain of their markets to foreign competitors.

It should be emphasized that there is no way these factors can be manipulated so as to produce a net economic gain to the United States. The ECA program involves economic sacrifice either in direct expenditure of Federal funds or in readjustments of agriculture and industry to allow for foreign competition.

The Congress finds it necessary, then, to balance the expenditure of tax dollars and the sacrifice of United States producers to foreign competition in such a way as to cause the minimum amount of economic and political disturbance to the American people.

Relation of ECA to United States agricultural surpluses

One large issue has already emerged with sufficient clarity to justify immediate consideration. That is the relation of the United States farm-price-support program to the foreign assistance program. Regardless of the procedure by which it will be implemented, it seems clear that the United States will follow a policy of holding the domestic prices of the major agricultural crops above world prices and of producing quantities of certain of these crops in excess of domestic requirements.

Under the circumstances, it is to our advantage to export such surpluses. The Economic Cooperation Administration now aids such exports by providing dollars to European governments for buying our cotton, wheat, tobacco, etc. The objection to this practice is that the American dollars are made available in such a way that pressure is constantly exerted on the European countries to buy all of these things from nondollar sources if they can possibly do so. After a country's program has been approved by the ECA and its allocation of dollars made, every pound of nondollar cotton and bushel of nondollar wheat that can be substituted for these commodities programed for export from America means that additional dollars will be available to buy other items.

There is, consequently, a constant incentive for the countries of Europe to expand cotton production in their colonial possessions and to bring additional areas into producing other crops. The United States, therefore, finds itself today in a position of simultaneously encouraging the production at home of cotton and other agricultural products by means of its price-support programs, while it is stimulating the production of the same things in foreign countries by pressing the ECA countries to buy from nondollar sources.

It would appear to be desirable to eliminate this inconsistency, if possible.

A possible solution to the problem would be to provide to Marshall-plan countries an agreed-upon quantity of cotton, tobacco, etc., as part of the foreign-aid program, rather than continuing the present practice of giving them an equivalent number of dollars with a good deal of discretion as to how they will be spent. That is, a portion of the ECA appropriation should be expended to buy predetermined quantities of agricultural commodities in the United States. The participating countries would then have available to them supplies of American cotton, tobacco, etc., previously agreed upon with ECA as essential to their programs. They would have no incentive, however, to substitute for these items the same commodities from nondollar sources. The dollar cost to the United States would be no less and the total contribution to Europe would be the same. The only difference would be that expansion of nondollar agricultural production of crops important to the United States economy would not be encouraged.

There is no question but that the receiving countries would prefer that the present system be continued. Nevertheless, it is not unreasonable for the United States to make the retention of a place for certain American farm products in the European market one of the elements of the recovery program which we finance. Stated in more general terms, we merely take the position that in aiding western Europe to orient itself in the postwar world, there are certain adjustments of our internal economy (curtailment of cotton production, for example) which are too burdensome for the United States to make. The reconstruction of Europe which we finance cannot, therefore, include the supplanting of United States supplies of certain commodities by the development at our expense of new sources.

During the calendar year 1949 the ECA allocated $575,900,000 for the procurement of cotton and a total of $1,823,400,000 for food and agricultural commodities. Even though the appropriation for ECA for fiscal 1951 is smaller than previously, a large portion of the money will necessarily be used to buy American farm products. If this expenditure is properly safeguarded, this appropriation can be regarded as serving the dual purpose of aiding Europe and at the same time helping to finance the United States agricultural program.

Long-run problem of European agricultural expansion

The point made here is based entirely on current realities. In the long run there may appear a basic conflict between the ability of Europe to support itself and the American price-support program. There is a widespread belief among American observers that the agricultural production of Europe could be substantially increased if a comprehensive effort were made to do so. It is not so much a question of more tractors as it is of modifying the system of land holding, development of something equivalent to the United States extension service, and breaking down the social inhibitions that perpetuate in Europe a sort of peasant status for the farmer.

Furthermore, if Europe finds it impossible to regain her old place as the manufacturer for the Asiatic, African, and South American Continents, it may be necessary for her to devote an increasing proportion of her resources to producing her own food.

Such a development might eventually add to the cost of our own agricultural price-support program.

RELATION OF THE ECA PROGRAM TO FOREIGN MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND POINT 4 PROGRAMS

Perhaps the most important United States foreign-policy developments since the passage of the original ECA legislation are the North Atlantic Treaty and the point 4 program. The implications for ECA of these programs are far reaching and merit more consideration than they have received to date.

During the period of June 1947 through April 1948, when the ECA program was being formulated, the most pressing problem was conceived to be the prevention of the economic collapse of the countries of Europe, in the belief that such collapse would result in the establishment of police states in place of democratic governments friendly to the United States.

The foreign military-assistance program and the North Atlantic Treaty have extended this effort to include a cooperative undertaking for the United States to aid the countries of western Europe in protecting themselves against external aggression.

The point 4 program for underdeveloped areas is aimed at increasing the world's productive resources and at the same time raising the standard of living of the people of such areas.

This extension of American cooperation with foreign nations raises the question as to whether the job to be done by ECA has changed appreciably and whether its financial requirements are different than originally conceived.

In addition to the direct value of its contribution of food, fuel, and equipment to Europe at its inception, the ECA undoubtedly performed a great symbolic function by indicating to the people of the participating countries that they were not being left to face the future alone and that the United States was behind them, while at the same time the Soviet world was put on notice that it was not to have a free hand in exploiting the ills of western Europe.

The advent of the foreign military assistance program should remove from the shoulders of the ECA any responsibility for performing this symbolic function. American military cooperation provides adequate evidence that we stand behind the countries desiring to participate, and serves as a warning to Russia. As a result, the Administrator of the recovery program should be able to limit his efforts to the technical job of aiding in the economic reconstruction of Europe and look to others for direction as to any action to be taken by him for political or military reasons. In other words, the ECA is no longer the sole instrument for attaining the objectives of United States foreign policy in Europe and, consequently, its responsibilities are somewhat less than before.

Since the United States is now actively striving for military and political results in Europe which are more far-reaching than economic recovery, it is essential that the ECA program should be coordinated with these broader objectives. The danger to be avoided in this connection is that the ECA program shall be defined and limited in such a way that it becomes an end in itself which is carried forward within its legislative boundaries regardless of whether the countries which are beneficiaries of the program are really meeting their obligations in cooperating with the United States in its entire program.

There have been a number of instances in the past 2 years in which ECA countries have refused or delayed cooperation in such matters as negotiating a trade treaty, action to remedy discrimination against American businessmen, avoiding bilateral trade agreements and controlling trade with the iron-curtain countries. Whenever it has been suggested that there was an inconsistentcy in supplying United States dollars to a nation which did not cooperate wholeheartedly with the United States, the reply ordinarily given has been that the matters involved were outside the ECA program and that it was wrong to mix up European recovery with other issues.

This compartmentalization of United States foreign policy seems particularly questionable after the United States has committed itself to the North Atlantic Treaty and to the foreign military assistance program. It does not seem to be desirable for the nations of Europe which are to be our allies and are the recipients of our aid to be able to live up to their agreements with us in compartment A while failing to do so in compartment B. If effective united military action is ever to come, it would seem that economic and political disunity cannot be perpetuated. Therefore, the ECA program should be so established that it can be adjusted whenever necessary to further the broad objectives of the United States.

Aspects of ECA practice which might interfere with coordination with military assistance

Public Law 472, section 102 (a), as amended, provides that economic assistance shall be given "to those countries of Europe which participate in a joint recovery program. * * *" and it encourages a joint organization. The ECA policy since its inception has been to strengthen and increase the prestige of the Organization for Economic Cooperation (OEEC), the organization of the participating European countries. The OEEC includes two nations (Sweden and Ireland) which receive Marshall-plan aid but which have refused to accept the North Atlantic Treaty. It also includes Turkey, Greece, Austria, Trieste, and the German Federal Republic which have not yet been admitted to membership in the treaty.

It apparently will be difficult to use the ECA program and the foreign military-assistance program to supplement each other with maximum effectiveness if each is operated through a different group of nations, the purposes of which are markedly different.

Furthermore, the ECA has used great pressure to get the OEEC to accept the function of dividing up United States aid and has constantly tried to avoid interfering in the sovereignty of the European nations. As the United States program for Europe has broadened and become more clearly defined, the question of how much responsibility should be turned over to the nations of Europe for spending our money and planning military strategy in which we are to participate might well be reconsidered. When the ECA began, it was widely accepted that a transfusion of American dollars would save Europe's life and that western Europe could, after regaining its strength, go its own way independent of the United States, with confidence that its ideals and our own coincided closely enough so that no serious conflict would be likely.

Since then, however, we have decided to throw in our lot with these countries on a military program. We certainly do not want to follow a policy of noninterference in the decisions of European nations in this program, and if the most effective use of our economic-aid expenditures is to be made we presumably should not transfer as much control over them to the participating nations as was once thought desirable.

The place of the Administrator of the Economic Cooperation Administration and of the Economic Cooperation Administration itself in the United States Government might well be reconsidered in view of the extension of our foreign programs. The Administrator has been given Cabinet rank and not subordinated to the Secretary of State. On the other hand, the director of the foreign military assistance program has been placed in the State Department. Although the scale of expenditures of the ECA is expected to be larger during the remainder of the program than will be the case with military aid, there is a real question as to whether this relationship of the ECA to the other agencies of the United States Government operating in foreign affairs should be continued.

A possible means of reorienting the ECA so as to facilitate its functioning as a participant of a somewhat larger group than was the case when the State-ECA team was set up in 1948, would be to make the Administrator a member of the National Security Council which advises "the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to the national security so as to enable the military services and the other departments and agencies of the Government to cooperate more effectively in matters involving the national security."

Possibly desirable to modify ECA programing procedure

The approach which has been utilized in the past in determining how much money should be appropriated for economic aid to Europe and for allocating dollars to individual countries is apparently not well adapted to adjusting economic assistance to the requirements of a broader program of foreign activities.

In general these determinations have been based on the dollar deficits of the participating countries. Once such an estimate has been approved by ECA it is difficult to justify giving a country any amount other than the estimated sum. If economic assistance is to be fitted into a European program which includes military and political cooperation, it would be necessary to be able to adjust allocations to reflect performance in these matters. The present programing procedure of ECA tends to make the principal requisite for ECA aid the possession of a dollar deficit and to set machinery in motion which provides the aid indicated without regard to other considerations.

An argument can be made that the time has come for abandoning the dollar deficit approach. (See below, p. 23.) To continue to base aid allocations on the estimated deficit gives a certain incentive for deficits to be continued. If the amount of dollars determined on the basis of other criteria, allocated to a country were less than its estimated deficit, the deficit might be eliminated by the country involved by curtailing its dollar expenditures to the money available while at the same time the performance stressed by the other criteria would be encouraged. That is, economy and internal readjustments would be forced on the participating country. It could not postpone such action by living off of the United States money.

Moreover, without a military assistance program the drastic curtailment or complete cutting off of economic aid to a participating country which was able to pay its own way would have tended to deprive such a country of any incentive to cooperate with the United States. A country which participates in both the ECA and military-aid programs, however, could have its economic aid substantially curtailed and still find it desirable to cooperate wholeheartedly with the United States foreign policy because of its interest in the program for its defense.

It might be considered that the best way to taper off the economic assistance program without causing major political and economic repercussions at its end, would be to shift emphasis gradually from financing Europe's dollar shortage to financing particular policies or projects which would strengthen Europe and further the objectives of the United States. That is, if a government is cooperating in the military strategy of the North Atlantic Treaty, is removing subsidies and restrictions, and is reforming its tax structure, the United States could assure it of enough dollars to provide a specified calorie diet to its people. The country would have to curtail its dollar expenditures for other purposes, however to what its own resources permitted. There is danger under the present practice that the country which does the poorest job might get the most money.

Conclusions as to significance of foreign military assistance to ECA program

1. The commitment of the United States to participate in a long-range program of mutual military aid with certain of the countries of Europe has altered the role of ECA in United States foreign policy by making it necessary for economic aid to be fitted into a broader and longer-range program and making the ECA no longer the "sole instrument" of the United States for assisting the countries of western Europe to maintain themselves.

2. The policies and structure of the ECA should be modified so as to make the economic rehabilitation of Europe less an end in itself than is at present the case, and to integrate economic aid into the broader program for the military and political strengthening of Europe.

3. Such changes in the responsibilities of ECA should shrink its operations and its costs.

The relation of the point 4 program and ECA

As it is conceived at present, the proposed point 4 program is apparently aimed at increasing the use of the resources and raising the standard of living of the underdeveloped areas of the world. The program appears to be directed toward parts of the world other than those participating in the ECA program. Furthermore, the appropriation which is to be requested of $25,000,000 is so small that the scope of the point 4 program will inevitably be much narrower than that of the ECA.

There are two aspects of the point 4 proposals which may have some significance to the ECA program.

The first is private investment by Americans in foreign countries. As discussed previously (p. 8 ff.), there are numerous obstacles at present to investment by Americans in foreign countries. To the extent that a way can be found to facilitate private investment by Americans in underdeveloped areas, it may be possible, by the same procedure, to shift some of the cost of European reconstruction to private investors.

The second connection between point 4 and ECA concerns the colonies of the participating countries. As pointed out above (p. 7), ECA funds are supplied for developing the colonies of the participating countries, and the investment of these funds tends to maintain an artificial economic relationship which is inconsistent with the economic unification of Europe. Consideration should be given to whether or not the economic programs for the dependencies of the ECA countries might not be shifted to the point 4 program. Such action might lighten the cost of aid to Europe and promote economic unification.

ADVANTAGES OF REVISION OF BASIS FOR APPROPRIATION

From the foregoing examination of the economic foreign aid programs of the United States, it appears that the three big things before the second session of the Eighty-first Congress in considering ECA legislation are—

First, the fact that the military commitments of the United States in Europe have broadened our foreign policy objectives and have assured our active interest in European economics and politics for a period of years, the length of which is difficult to define. It is necessary to coordinate the ECA program with these more extended objectives.

Second, the reconstructed European economy which confronts us today does not conform very closely to our hopes for a "new Europe" from which the old weaknesses were eliminated and which could be counted on to pay its own way. (See p. 3 above.) It is desirable, therefore, to consider the possibility of modifying ECA's investments and the incentives it offers in order to produce the desired results.

Third, in view of the current budgetary problem of the United States, it is desirable to attempt a more precise estimate of the costs of the ECA program than has previously been possible.

Advantages of changing basis for determining ECA appropriation

The two previous appropriations for ECA have been based on esitmates of the anticipated dollar deficits of the participating countries for the fiscal year. This basis is inherently unsatisfactory because it connects the amount of United States aid received by a country to its deficit rather than directly to a program of positive action.

An appropriation estimated in this way was apparently justified at the beginning of the program since Europe was so near prostration that a "transfusion" of dollars was all that could be attempted. For 2 years now such "transfusions" have been given and the pulse and respiration of the patient have responded (industrial production in Europe is above prewar). After 2 years, however, it is no longer enough to keep the patient alive. It is time to administer a course of treatment which will condition the countries of western Europe to the environment in which they will have to survive.

It would appear to be reasonable to require that a program for spending United States funds for foreign aid should ultimately meet the following tests:

1. The allocation to each country should be linked to specific, constructive courses of action—political as well as economic.

United States dollars should go to countries which are making basic structural changes in their economies (closing out a high-cost industry, for example); which are taking costly steps toward internal stability (such as installing a new tax system); or which incur losses to carry out a program of international cooperation (eliminating export and import controls, for instance).

2. Aid should be given in such a manner that the standard of living and general well-being of the country are primarily the responsibility of its government, not of the United States.

The people of a country should feel that the decisions which influence their calory consumption or level of employment are made in Europe and not in Washington. American aid should be thought of as available to countries that undertake courses of action which qualify them for it. A government can take such action or not—the more constructive its program the more money it gets.

One shortcoming of the dollar-deficit approach is that the responsibility for financing the deficit is primarily that of the United States. If the United States decreases its allocation to a country, the resentment of the people focuses on the United States, not on their own government for failing to follow a course of action which would assure United States funds.

3. The aid program should be administered in such a manner as to minimize the incentive for a country to ask for more money than is necessary.

If economic assistance were linked always to specific constructive action by a country which, although in the long run was for the country's benefits, in the immediate future involved a painful internal readjustment, a country would not undertake such action unless it were necessary. Every program which involved sacrifice by the United States should also involve sacrifice by the country receiving United States dollars.

The dollar-deficit approach encourages every country to overstate its deficit.

Suggested aid program meeting these tests

If an appropriation for foreign aid were authorized to be expended for the following purposes, it is believed that the most important legislative problems connected with ECA would be solved. The following illustration provides a manner for appropriation which can be adapted to the determinations of Congress:

	Millions
Appropriation to finance a European clearing program (now under consideration by ECA and OEEC)	$xxx
Appropriation to finance export of United States farm products	x,xxx
Appropriation to provide capital for International RFC (for industrial projects—this sum would not be an annual expenditure: it could be replenished when necessary, but only on projects which promoted the economic unification of Europe)	xxx
Appropriation to guarantee private American investors against political risks	xxx
Appropriation for other programs	xxx
Total appropriation	x,xxx

Since no request for an appropriation for ECA has as yet been submitted, no attempt has been made to indicate dollar amounts for the items enumerated. It should be noted that during the calendar year 1949 about one-half of the ECA expenditures were for food and agricultural products. A figure of $500,000,000 has been mentioned in connection with the European clearing union.

One of the advantages of authorizing the appropriation in this way is that it gives Congress an opportunity to make separate determinations of the amounts which should be made available for such purposes as financing the export of United States agricultural products and building additional manufacturing capacity in Europe. An appropriation authorized in this manner would contribute just as much to Europe's dollar shortage as one based on dollar deficits. It provides an additional incentive for constructive action.

The European clearing house is being sponsored by ECA to put the currencies of Europe on a convertible basis for current transactions. While no judgment is yet possible as to the merit or success of the plan, if it is adopted the ECA apparently will require legislative approval to finance it.

The appropriation to finance exports of United States farm products is discussed above.

The provision of capital to an International RFC is a possible solution to the problem of obtaining industrial integration in Europe. Our experience to date indicates that further expenditures for industrial construction according to past practice would be more likely to develop nationalization than unification. (See p. 5 above.) Furthermore, with European industry producing at prewar levels, there is an opportunity to slow down expenditure and redirect our efforts.

The International RFC contemplated would be an organization in which all the ECA countries would participate, but with the United States having a majority of the votes as long as it provided most of the capital. It would advance funds for industrial projects only if these projects conformed to a rigid set of requirements to insure that they advanced the integration of European industry. The capital would be replenished only as necessary and since many of the projects to be financed would be those believed to be economically sound it should be possible to augment the capital by public-debt transactions. As previously pointed out, the principal obstacle to industrial unification at present is not lack of dollars but the clearing away of political impediments and the solving of various organizational problems. The funds of the Corporation should be available to bear the cost of closing out industries and making necessary internal readjustments as well as to finance new construction. Since doing these things will take a good deal of time, it is unlikely that any substantial use of the capital of the new organization could be used during the fiscal year 1950–51.

It is better to wait and spend the money prudently than to spend it for unsound projects. The program outlined above gives the countries of Europe ample incentive to keep trying and to cooperate with each other and the United States. The existence of a fund for properly developed industrial projects should provide a major incentive to the people of Europe to clear away the obstacles and produce a sound program.

The appropriation to guarantee private investments is discussed above.

A sum to finance other programs should be provided to take care of situations not falling into the previous categories. It should be noted that the American farm products provided should be allocated among countries on the basis of their constructive programs. Nevertheless, it should be possible for the ECA to provide dollars for such a project as softening the impact on the Belgian and Dutch economies of completing the Benelux unification.

Does not involve giving ECA a blank check

At first glance it would appear that an appropriation authorized in this way in which dollars are not related to commodities (except for agricultural products) gives the ECA so much discretion that the money appropriated would not be safeguarded.

Consideration must be given, however, to the fact that the object of our expenditures has changed since 1948. When the immediate purpose of the foreign-assistance program was to keep western Europe from going under, the assurance that each dollar spent brought to Europe a dollar's worth of wheat, copper, machinery, etc., was adequate protection of the interests of the United States taxpayer.

As our problem in Europe becomes more and more one of developing an integrated and efficient industrial structure as well as securing full cooperation with a broad international program, the precision with which American dollars are translated into bushels and tons assumes a different significance. It is possible for us to get a full dollar's worth of merchandise for every dollar we spend and still waste the appropriation, because the commodities and equipment bought are used in ways which do not advance our primary objectives in Europe (building factories in high-cost locations, for example).

The taxpayers' money would be better protected if the ECA were required to justify its appropriation by defining precisely what the United States wants to accomplish in the participating countries and submitting its program for accomplishing these objectives, rather than concentrating its attention on calories, yards, and percentages of increased production.

(Attention is called to the fact that this study was prepared before the ECA had submitted its authorizations and appropriations requests.)

PROPOSED EUROPEAN PAYMENTS UNION

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, every Member of the Senate has been interested, I am sure, in the recent statement by the British Labor Party in which the party states that it is opposed to British participation in any programs for the unification of Europe. The Labor Party apparently fears that if the British join a unified Europe, its program of socialism might be interfered with.

I note that Mr. Attlee has since said that the British Government does not agree with the Labor Party on this point. Nevertheless, I feel that it is becoming increasingly necessary for the United States to find out whether the British really are with us wholeheartedly in our European program, or not.

One important area in which the real intentions of the British remain obscure is in regard to the European Payments Union which is being organized at the present time. After a long period in which the United Kingdom would not say whether it would come in or stay out, the British finally agreed to come in. A long period of negotiation appears to be in prospect because of British efforts to obtain preferred treatment for the sterling area in the new Payments Union.

A report on the proposed European Payments Union was prepared last March by the staff of the watch-dog committee of which I am chairman. This report sets forth the basic issues involved and contains a brief analysis of the British attitude toward the payments union.

Because of its bearing on the current position of the British on cooperating with their European neighbors, I ask unanimous consent that this report be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROPOSED EUROPEAN PAYMENTS UNION

(This document is presented to assist Members of the Congress in their consideration of pending ECA legislation and is not a statement of the committee's views on the issues discussed.)

(Submitted by the ECA)

1. THE USE OF EUROPEAN RESOURCES AND INTRA-EUROPEAN TRADE

One of the urgent problems that confronted the ECA at the very beginning of the Marshall plan in the summer of 1948 was that of freeing trade among the participating countries from the many restrictions, especially exchange controls of various forms, that were strangling it. Only through an expanded trade could the Europeans make the fullest possible use of their resources by supplying one another with the goods and services they could produce. Clearly, the more use the Europeans could make of their own resources the more rapid could be the pace of recovery and the lighter would be the burden on the United States.

The most severe restrictions on trade among the western European countries grew out of the dollar shortage. Any European country which buys more from one of its neighbors than it is able to sell to that neighbor has to find some way of paying for the difference. Prior to the European-recovery program, this usually meant a payment in gold or dollars. Practically every country was reluctant to pay out dollars in order to make purchases in Europe and other soft-currency areas. The result was a general tendency to restrict imports by imposing exchange controls and quantitative restrictions on trade.

For instance, Belgium has traditionally been an exporter of steel; Greece and Norway have to import it. Yet, Greece cannot sell enough olive oil, tobacco, and fruit to Belgium; and Norway cannot sell enough fish, lumber, and paper pulp to pay for the steel and all the other goods they wish to buy in Belgium. Therefore, under the conditions prevailing at the beginning of the Marshall plan, these two countries might have had to use their ECA aid to buy steel in the United States at a time when the steel could have been produced in Europe. Obviously, this would have increased the cost of the recovery program. The only other course that the Greeks and Norwegians might have followed was that of restricting the importation of most goods from Belgium so as to save their earnings of Belgian currency for such highly essential items as steel. Either way, European trade was stifled, European resources were not put to their best uses, and recovery was impeded.

Given the nature of this situation, the quickest way to stimulate an expansion of European trade, and thus a fuller use of European resources, was to provide the means whereby any participating country could pay for the excess of its purchases from its neighbors over its sales to the same neighbors.

2. OFFSHORE PURCHASES

The first device that was employed to accomplish this purpose was to allow each participating country to use its ECA dollars to buy goods in other participating countries. To use the previous example, Greece and Norway would pay for as large a part as possible of their purchases in Belgium with their own earnings of Belgian francs. The balance of their purchases they would pay for with ECA dollars. The dollars that the Belgians earned from their neighbors in this fashion could then be used to finance imports into Belgium from the dollar area. In this way these dollars were used twice, once to finance purchases in Belgium by other European countries and a second time to help cover Belgium's dollar deficit. Since the dollars would otherwise have gone directly to Belgium for the latter purposes, there was, of course, no increase in the amount of aid required.

Offshore purchases with ECA dollars were an effective emergency method of preventing the further shrinkage of European trade. But this method had disadvantages. The fact that ECA dollars could be used in this fashion led more and more sellers, often with the support of their governments, to insist on payment in dollars. In this way the countries tried to earn dollars from one another. Often prices quoted in dollar transactions were lower than the prices asked for the same goods by the same seller when they were sold for European currencies. If long continued, therefore, this practice would have disrupted trade in Europe, even though, initially, it acted as a stimulant.

3. THE INTRA-EUROPEAN PAYMENTS PLAN

In September 1948, therefore, a second and more effective arrangement was devised which was called the intra-European payments plan. Its basic principle is simple. A part of the ECA dollar aid to each creditor country, which it needs to pay for its necessary imports from the dollar area, is given only on condition that the recipient country extend grants-in-aid of the same amount in its own currency to the other participating countries with which it has a trade surplus. (This part of the aid is called conditional aid.) In this way the debtor country receives a grant, which is called a drawing right, in the currency of each country with which it has a trade deficit. Stated in terms of the earlier example, Belgium receives ECA dollar financing (as conditional aid) to pay for goods and services from the United States and elsewhere in the dollar area on condition that it make a grant of Belgium francs to Greece with which Greece can buy steel in Belgium.

The intra-European payments plan has made a major contribution toward the freeing of European trade and, consequently, the better use of European resources. By financing trade deficits, it has removed, or weakened, the incentive of each country to husband its dollars, or to earn dollars from its neighbors, by restricting its imports from them. But it is based on a series of bilateral arrangements between pairs of countries. The drawing rights that Belgium gives Greece can (except for a small portion) be used only in Belgium. Greece cannot shop around and buy its steel in the cheapest market in Europe. Moreover, the present payments plan does not furnish enough stimulus to the individual countries to bring their trade into balance. Accordingly, it is time to take a further step through the creation of a European Payments Union which will make European currencies freely convertible into one another (for current as distinguished from capital transactions) and thus facilitate a further dismantling of restrictions on trade among the participating countries.

4. EUROPEAN PAYMENTS UNION

The fundamentals of the proposed Payments Union are similar to those of the present payments plan but the mechanics of the operation will be quite different. The Payments Union will not be a device for underwriting European currencies or protecting overvalued currencies. Its basic function, like that of the present payments plan and the earlier offshore purchases, will be to provide the means whereby a debtor country can cover the deficit in its trade with its neighbors without having to make full payment in gold or dollars. Europe's internal trade is not yet in balance. Some countries still have to buy more from their neighbors than they sell to them. These countries must still have help in financing their trade deficits if they are to feel free to eliminate trade restrictions.

The operation of the Payments Union will not change either the amount of aid needed, or the purposes for which ECA dollars are ultimately used by the Europeans. The ECA dollars which are used to support its operations (and which correspond to the conditional aid of the intra-European payments plan) will find their way to the countries that turn out to be creditors in their trade with the rest of western Europe to be used by those countries to buy the goods and services they must have from the dollar area. The only difference is that, under the proposed amendment, assistance may be furnished to the participating countries indirectly through the Payments Union and may be in the form of dollars not earmarked for the purchase by the recipient country of particular goods and services.

This new Payments Union will be an improvement over the old intra-European payments plan in two important respects.

The first is that it will permit trade to be conducted within Europe on a truly multilateral basis. The Payments Union will be, in effect, a clearinghouse of which all the central banks of the participating countries will be members and through which they will be able to settle their accounts with one another. Even at the present time, individual private transactions between the citizens of any two countries are offset against one another by their two central banks so that only a single payment from one to the other is necessary. In the Payments Union this clearinghouse operation will be carried a step further. Each country's deficits with some of its neighbors will be offset against its surpluses with others so that only a single net settlement between its central bank and the clearinghouse will be necessary. In this way an enormous volume of transactions can be handled with minimum payments between countries.

The financing of trade deficits through the Payments Union will also be done entirely on a multilateral basis. A country that is a debtor in its trade with other European countries, instead of receiving drawing rights consisting of fixed amounts of the currencies of each of its prospective creditors (as in the present plan), will have the right to draw upon the central clearinghouse for any European currency it needs to make purchases from its neighbors. There will, of course, be a limit to the total amount a country may borrow in all currencies. A creditor country, instead of supplying drawing rights consisting of fixed amounts of its own currency directly to various prospective debtor countries, will provide its own currency to the clearinghouse as needed, up to a stated limit. To refer once more to the earlier example, Greece will be able to choose freely whether it will draw on the clearinghouse for Belgian francs to buy its steel in Belgium, or in German marks to buy its steel in Germany, or in pounds sterling to buy its steel in Britain.

In such a completely flexible system, it will be impossible to predict in advance the exact amount that any particular debtor country will need to obtain from the Payments Union or that any particular creditor will need to furnish to it. Therefore, it will not be possible to allocate in advance a definite sum of ECA conditional aid to each country that will be a creditor. Instead, dollars can be paid to the creditor country only when it actually has to supply its own currency to the clearinghouse. Thus, neither the countries that will ultimately receive these dollars, nor the amounts they will receive, nor the time during the year when the payments will be made, can be accurately foreseen. It is proposed, therefore, that a considerable part of the ECA funds required for the financing of European trade deficits be granted as aid to the Payments Union and, in effect, earned from the clearinghouse by the creditor countries. It is for this reason that the ECA seeks the authority to furnish a part of the aid to Europe next year by means of the transfer of dollars through a central institution of this character.

The second major change and improvement in the new Payments Union, as compared with the present payments plan, is that the trade deficits that develop among the European countries will be paid for only partly with ECA aid in the manner just described. The balance will be paid for partly out of the dollar resources of the countries themselves and partly out of funds loaned to the Payments Union by the creditors, without any relation to ECA aid.

Whenever a country turns out to be a debtor—that is, whenever it buys more from its neighbors than it sells to them—it will have to meet part of the deficit thus incurred by the payment of its own gold or dollars to the Payments Union; unless its deficit is held within fixed limits or is of a purely seasonal character. Whenever a country turns out to be a creditor—that is, when it sells more to its neighbors than it buys from them—it will receive payment to cover this trading surplus only partly in gold or dollars. The balance due will remain simply as a debt in European currencies owed to the creditor country by the clearinghouse.

The advantage of requiring debtors to make part payment in gold or dollars and creditors to finance a part of their exports with loans is that the European countries are in this way given a strong incentive to bring their trade into a reasonable balance. The debtor's obligation to cover a part of its trade deficit in hard money gives it an incentive to reduce the size of its trade deficit. Likewise the creditor, having to finance a part of its export surplus by extending credits will be more willing to import from its neighbors and thus bring its trade more nearly into balance. It is in this way that the operation of the Payments Union will help to cure the disease and not merely alleviate its symptoms.

Moreover, a Payments Union that operates in this manner can prepare the way for the end of ECA aid. By 1952 the trade surpluses and deficits among the European countries will have to be small enough to be financed entirely by a combination of credits and gold and dollar payments through a central institution without the help of any ECA funds. The establishment of the Payments Union is a significant step in this direction. After its first year of operation, it can be modified in such a way as to reduce its dependence on ECA funds. We hope that, by the end of the ERP, it can operate as an independent institution financed entirely out of European resources.

THE PROPOSED EUROPEAN CLEARING ORGANIZATION

(Prepared by the "watchdog committee" staff)

The ECA has taken the initiative in proposing to the countries of western Europe that they set up a clearinghouse type of organization which would operate so as to make the currencies of the participating countries transferable for current transactions. The essence of the proposal is not the clearing mechanism which involves bookkeeping primarily and about which there is little controversy. The significant point is that the proposal involves the underwriting, within limits, by the United States of the credit of the various member countries so that their currencies will be acceptable.

The ECA has pushed the matter aggressively. Mr. Hoffman apparently feels that the ECA makes a poorer showing on bringing about European integration and removing intra-European trade barriers than on other aspects of its program. Some people believe that Mr. Hoffman hoped to bring home from his recent trip to Europe an agreement to establish a clearing organization as evidence to Congress that something tangible had been accomplished in this direction.

The European response to the ECA proposal has been disappointing to the ECA. The Marshall plan countries have agreed to study the matter to see if something can be worked out, but nothing more.

The ECA clearinghouse proposal apparently stirred up a certain amount of conflict among the United States agencies represented on the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems (Treasury, State, Commerce, Federal Reserve, Export-Import Bank, and ECA). It was necessary for the ECA to change the original proposal which it sent to the European countries and on which these countries had been working for a month before the approval of the National Advisory Council was obtained. This controversy appears to have handicapped Mr. Hoffman in his negotiations in Europe by raising doubts in the minds of the Europeans as to whether or not the United States Government was fully behind Mr. Hoffman.

The inconvertibility of European currencies should be regarded as more of a symptom of fundamental ailments rather than as a disease in itself. Nevertheless, a large share of the restrictions imposed on foreign trade and the predominantly bilateral pattern of intra-European trade are directly attributable to the fact that each country regards the currencies of some of its neighbors as inferior.

In the past the ECA has felt that it had to accept the general pattern of bilateral restrictions existing in Europe and try to bring about modest improvements while concentrating primarily on nonmonetary problems—principally building up production. The conditional grant-drawing right procedure employed by the ECA in the past has been essentially a device designed to stimulate intra-European trade along bilateral lines. Although it offered the advantage of permitting individual countries to come out with a deficit or credit balance as a result of bilateral trade rather than coming out even, as is ordinarily the purpose, this drawing-right approach has not worked very well. It required advance estimates of the trade balance of each participating country with every other, which proved to be quite inaccurate, and the devaluation of European currencies last fall made a fresh start mandatory.

The ECA maintains that it does not insist on any specific procedure and is willing to accept any European clearing arrangement that will work which the participating countries develop. The major elements in the proposal submitted by the ECA, however, are as follows:

1. Each country is to settle its net multilateral balances with the Payments Union rather than settle with individual countries. This is possible only if the deficit countries are assured of sound money to meet their obligations and if the creditor countries are assured of receiving good money in payment for their export balances.

2. The ECA will provide United States dollars up to a specified limit to assure acceptable payment of balances.

3. A system of automatic controls is provided to encourage both deficit and creditor countries to bring their exports and imports into balance. The ECA suggestion is that a net deficit up to a designated limit will be underwritten by ECA; that a larger deficit in a certain range will be carried partly by credit and financed partly by the countries' own gold or dollars; and that beyond a predetermined limit a debtor country will have to pay in full with its own gold or dollars. In the case of a country with an export balance for its intra-European payments a reverse procedure would apply. The export surplus would be paid partly in gold or dollars and partly in credit in varying proportions on a predetermined scale.

This type of control offers the advantage that, after the limiting figures have been arrived at, no bureaucratic screening of individual transactions is necessary to hold the individual countries in line. It should be noted also that the system encourages a country like Belgium to bring its trade with the other countries of western Europe into balance. That is, Belgium is not encouraged to build up a large export balance in its intra-European trade. She benefits from importing as much as possible from Europe and, once her limits are reached, she has every inducement to prefer exporting to the dollar area.

4. The ECA proposal contemplates the elimination by the members of the Payments Union of bilateral quotas and restrictions. That is, there would be no more controls which made it possible to import an item from one neighbor but not from another or which made it possible for an importer to obtain foreign exchange to make payments in guilders or lire but not in francs or deutschemarks. Any exchange controls or import quotas which were permitted would be multilateral (for trade with European countries; this would not be true of nonmembers of the Payments Union). That is, a country could continue to use import and exchange controls to hold down the volume of imports and to prevent the importing of luxuries, but these restrictions would apply equally to all participating suppliers. A limitation on the imports of passenger automobiles would apply to all European exporters. There would be no prohibition of imports of autos from France while permitting them from Italy, for example.

5. The ECA proposal provided for a governing board for the Payments Union which could act without unanimous agreement, which would consult with members of the union and advise them as to measures which they should take to balance payments. The ECA originally contemplated that the United States would be represented on this board, but the National Advisory Council believed this to be undesirable and the ECA proposal has been modified accordingly.

The ECA recognizes that if the European currencies are to maintain their convertibility after the termination of United States aid, heroic action by the Marshall-plan countries to bring their payments into balance will be necessary. The governing board is presumably expected to provide technical advice and apply a certain amount of pressure so that individual countries will make the painful internal adjustments which will be unavoidable.

It has been proposed, also, that ECA dollars would be made available not only to finance predetermined payments deficits, as already outlined, but that the ECA would stand by to give assistance if efforts of individual countries to liberalize trade worked out adversely. The governing board would presumably make recommendations for financing of this character.

The objection of the National Advisory Council to United States membership in this board apparently arose from concern over the relationship between the European Payments Union and the International Monetary Fund (Bretton Woods). By international agreement, all members of the Monetary Fund must consult it before changing their foreign exchange rates. The governing board of the Payments Union would presumably give consideration to exchange rates, and it was felt that the United States should only give formal consideration to such matters through the International Monetary Fund, rather than through both organizations.

OBJECTIONS OF THE EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

The unwillingness of the Marshall-plan countries to adopt the ECA proposal for a payments union immediately appears not to be, with the exception of the United Kingdom, due to any disagreement on fundamentals which has yet become apparent. There has been the natural hesitation of the individual countries while they tried to determine whether their net "take" of United States dollars would be less under the clearing arrangements than otherwise, and there has been a good deal of questioning of operating details. The ECA did not submit a detailed plan all ready to be put into operation, so that most of the technical problems are as yet unsolved.

The situation of the United Kingdom does, however, raise some large issues. The sterling area is itself a payments union. England apparently believes that her future as a world power depends on maintaining her position as center of the sterling area. Consequently, all of the discussions so far have contemplated the inclusion of the entire sterling area in the European Payments Union, although it would be represented only by the United Kingdom. The individual countries would not be members. This creates a problem, insofar as one of the objectives of the Payments Union is to promote European integration. Pakistan is part of the sterling area but is not part of Europe. There are some who question whether Pakistan should be integrated into the European economic structure rather than concentrating its efforts on attaining full convertibility in world trade generally without passing through any intermediate regional stage.

Furthermore, there is some feeling that the British fear the European Payments Union as a rival of the sterling area. The political ties that hold the sterling area together are in most cases tenuous and in some cases have disappeared. The various member countries are likely to give the United Kingdom their banking patronage only as long as they feel that they receive worth-while service as a result. If a European Payments Union should become a major factor in world commerce it is possible that certain countries might desert the sterling area and join the European group. It may be that eventualities of this nature influence the British attitude toward the ECA proposal.

CONFLICTING VIEWS OF UNITED STATES AGENCIES

Several of the United States agencies which belong to the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems show markedly less enthusiasm for the European Payments Union than the ECA does, although the Council has approved the ECA proposal in principle. Any reservations which these agencies may have do not appear to be based on technical grounds. There appears to be general agreement that a clearing organization functioning in the manner proposed would be workable and that such a step would be a considerable advance beyond the "drawing right" arrangements which have preceded it.

It is possible that bureaucratic jurisdictions have been infringed and jealousies aroused. The ECA apparently submitted its proposal for a clearing organization to the Marshall-plan countries without getting the full official clearance of the National Advisory Council, and there appears to be an attitude that "this is the ECA's baby" rather than that the Payments Union represents an all-out effort by the United States Government.

Nevertheless, there appear to be two real points which lead to questions by the non-ECA agencies. The first is the relation of the Payments Union to the International Monetary Fund. Ever since the Bretton Woods Agreement it has been the policy of the United States to work toward the free convertibility of all the world's currencies and the International Monetary Fund has been the instrument for attaining this objective. The attention of the National Advisory Council agencies has been focused on this ultimate objective and there is a tendency for them to see any regional organization such as the European Payments Union, dedicated to attaining the same objectives but for a limited group of countries, as being in conflict with the Monetary Fund, and to fear that the actions which might bring about regional convertibility of currencies might have the effect of delaying the attainment of world-wide convertibility.

The other major issue which appears to exist in the minds of the National Advisory Council members is the question as to whether or not it is desirable for the United States to foster in Europe a regional soft-currency area which is protected from United States competition by trade restrictions and which develops an artificial economic structure within its walls. To a considerable extent this is what the economic integration of Europe does.

It is clear that both these issues are closely related and revolve about the question of whether or not we should work directly toward world peace and world-wide economic stability through world-wide organizations (the United Nations and the International Monetary Fund) or whether we should utilize a regional organization or organizations as an intermediate step toward this ultimate goal.

Before the establishment of the ECA, the United States was definitely committed to the former approach, and the executive agencies which were responsible for our international operations prior to ECA have attained a certain momentum carrying them in this direction.

The ECA, on the other hand, was created to deal with regional problems and was directed in Public Law 472, section 102 (a), as amended, "to encourage the unification of Europe" and was reminded "of the advantages which the United States has enjoyed through the existence of a large domestic market with no internal trade barriers." Consequently, in devising means for unifying Europe and eliminating trade barriers, the ECA has concentrated on finding the best way to attain these results (the Clearing Union being the culmination of its efforts up to the present) without spending its time thinking about whether we really want to integrate western Europe or not.

The conflict in views among the members of the National Advisory Council on International Monetary and Financial Problems appears to boil down to the following:

None of the agencies seems to believe that a European clearing organization will not overcome barriers to commerce or stimulate intra-European trade. Neither do they argue that the Clearing Union advocated by the ECA is badly designed from a technical point of view and that as a consequence it will not work. Their lack of enthusiasm for the European Payments Union appears to arise not from any misgivings as to its ability to attain its objectives, but rather from a questioning as to whether the United States should strive for these objectives. They are apprehensive that the building of an integrated Europe will necessitate the maintenance of barriers which will keep United States exports out of the European market and which may delay the attainment of world-wide convertibility.

It would be possible to eliminate any confusion or inconsistency among the executive agencies on this issue by congressional action. If Congress approves the establishment of a European Payments Union and makes an appropriation for its operation, it should be a clear indication of approval of regional action along this line and provide a directive to the National Advisory Council that the intent of Congress was clear.

FACTORS TO BE CONSIDERED

Before accepting or rejecting a proposal to use United States dollars to finance a clearing organization in Europe, Congress will inevitably consider anew several factors:

1. The economic integration of Europe is a bigger job and will take a longer time than was at first realized by most people.

2. The building of an integrated European economy can take place only behind restrictions which will keep out competing United States supplies of certain farm and manufactured products while "infant" soft-currency sources of supply are developed. The hope is that after a transition period the new integrated Europe will be able to stand on its own feet in competition for world markets and that its revived economy will provide a better market for United States exports than ever before. The short-run consequences of such action when the United States is beginning to be conscious of the problem of finding markets for its exports cannot be ignored.

3. The commitment of the United States to a regional military program by our participation in the North Atlantic Treaty may necessitate a regional economic program as a supplement. Nations which are bankrupt or the victims of increasing economic unrest cannot be effective military partners.

4. A strong argument can be made that at some time before 1952 a change in the basis for ECA appropriations should be made: that is, funds should be allocated less and less on the basis of the dollar deficits of the receiving countries and more and more to finance programs for constructive development. An appropriation to underwrite the European Payments Union would be a step in this direction.

Such an appropriation should not be made as an addition to ECA aid. Every dollar Europe receives from any source eases its dollar shortage. An appropriation to finance a clearing arrangement should be a diversion of dollars which would otherwise have been allocated to individual countries.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no further routine business, the Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] is recognized under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I note that in his opening statement in the debate of the pending measure, H. R. 6000, the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance [Mr. GEORGE] speaking for himself and as chairman of the committee, advised the Senate that under the recommendations of the committee about 1,000,000 persons engaged in agricultural work are brought under the social-security system. I quote from the statement of the Senator from Georgia, as follows:

Workers on farms who are employed by one employer at least 60 days and earn $50 or more in a calendar quarter are covered, and, in addition, border-line agricultural workers, such as those engaged in processing and packing of agricultural and horticultural commodities off the farm, are brought under the system. These groups total about 1,000,000 persons. The committee gave careful study to the extension of coverage to workers on farms. It proposes this limited extension of coverage at this time in order to assure simplicity of administration for the farmer. There is no question but that workers on farms, including migratory workers and share croppers, need social-security protection. The public-assistance loads in the agricultural States reflect this need. To go beyond the coverage that is proposed in the bill, however, without further study of the administrative problems that would arise, would be impracticable. I regret that I am compelled to advocate delaying the extension of coverage to agricultural workers not covered by the bill until a thorough study of the feasibility of such coverage has been made.

Later in his statement the able Senator from Georgia made further reference to the same subject in the following words:

As I indicated earlier, the bill does not provide social-security protection for all citizens of the Nation. Some groups, such as share croppers, migrant agricultural labor, and part-time domestic servants, who are not brought under insurance coverage, need protection. I regret that further extension of coverage must await more detailed study of the problems inherent in bringing additional persons within the system.

I fully approve the conclusion reached by the Senate Committee on Finance that workers on farms need social-security protection. I also approve their recommendation that all of such workers who can be brought under the protection of the system at this time without bringing on complex bookkeeping and administrative burdens for the farmers should be included within the scope of the pending amendments.

Inasmuch as only a part of the agricultural workers are included within the amendment, whereas a larger part are excluded, I think it is highly desirable to clarify the subject for the record as much as possible. Since the Senator from Georgia is absent on official business I should like to address several questions to the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], ranking minority member of the committee, relating to those provisions of the pending bill which deal with the subject of agricultural labor. I shall appreciate it if the Senator from Colorado will accord me that privilege.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I wish to say that I shall be delighted to do the best I can.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

My first question is this. At the top of page 263 of the printed bill, in section 104 (a) of the bill, there appears as a part of section 213 of the amended Social Security Act the following verbiage:

SEC. 213. (a) For the purposes of this title—

(1) The term "quarter" and the term "calendar quarter" means a period of three calendar months ending on March 31, June 30, September 30, or December 31.

Applying the definition just quoted to that portion of the bill that deals with agricultural labor, is it possible to construe the terms "quarter" or "calendar quarter" to mean a 3 months' period commencing with the first day of the employment of any agricultural laborer, or is the time of employment of an agricultural laborer under the terms of this bill computed strictly with reference to the calendar quarters defined by that portion of the bill which I have just quoted?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I do not believe it is possible to construe the terms "quarter" or "calendar quarter" to mean a 3 months' period commencing with the first day of the employment of any agricultural labor. It seems clear to me that the language means a calendar quarter, the first quarter being the first 3 months starting from the first of the year, the second quarter being the next 3 months, and so on, until we have four quarters.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator.

I next refer to that portion of the bill appearing as part of section 210 of the amended Social Security Act (a) (1) (A), beginning at line 16, page 240 of the printed bill, and extending through line 7 of page 241, which reads as follows:

Except that, in the case of service performed after 1950, such term shall not include—

(1) (A) Agricultural labor, as defined in subsection (f) of this section) performed in any calendar quarter by an employee, unless the cash remuneration paid for such labor is $50 or more and such labor is performed for an employer by an individual who is regularly employed by such employer to perform such agricultural labor. For the purposes of this paragraph, an individual shall be deemed to be regularly employed by an employer during a calendar quarter only if (i) on each of some 60 days during such quarter such individual performs agricultural labor for such employer for some portion of the day, or (ii) such individual was regularly employed (as determined under clause (i)) by such employer in the performance of such labor during the preceding calendar quarter.

My second question to the distinguished Senator from Colorado relates to the requirement that an individual farm employee shall be deemed to be regularly employed by an employer during a calendar quarter, only if such individual performs agricultural labor for such employer "on each of some 60 days during such quarter." What is the meaning of the words "some 60 days," as appearing in the section of the bill from which I have just quoted?

Mr. MILLIKIN. The use of the word "some" is to afford a distinction between 60 consecutive days of labor during the quarter and 60 unconsecutive days of labor during the quarter.

Mr. HOLLAND. In other words, whether the 60 days are consecutive or not, if they appear as days within the calendar quarter, they will satisfy this particular requirement of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Exactly.

Mr. HOLLAND. My third question relates to the words "for some portion of the day" as they appear in the section which I last quoted. Am I correct in my understanding that if the employee performs agricultural labor for the employer during any portion of a calendar day during a calendar quarter, whether such portion shall be for only a few minutes or for any number of hours of said calendar day, such calendar day shall count as 1 day of employment during said calendar quarter?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think the Senator is entirely correct in his interpretation.

Mr. HOLLAND. My fourth question is this. Then the hours worked by the employee bear no relation whatever to the day factor, either by way of permitting the employer to add together part-time work in a group of several days to make 1 day or by way of fixing any limitation on the number of hours of work in any 1 day which should count as a full day, with the right of the employee to carry over any excess number of hours of work to another or a different day?

Mr. MILLIKIN. The employee or the employer would not have any right to carry over any of the hours of 1 day's work to some other day.

Mr. HOLLAND. My fifth question is this: If the agricultural worker qualified under the term employment for the first quarter, both by working 60 days and by receiving cash remuneration of $50, is it not correct that for the second of two consecutive quarters, the only requirement for coverage under the term employment is the payment of $50 of cash remuneration during the second quarter?

Mr. MILLIKIN. The distinguished Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. My sixth question is this: What provision of the bill, if any, will prevent an employer from employing an agricultural worker 59 days or less in a quarter and rehiring him in the succeeding quarter for 59 days or less, thus depriving the worker of the coverage of the law?

Mr. MILLIKIN. There is nothing in the bill which would prevent that.

Mr. HOLLAND. My seventh question is this: What provision of the bill, if any, will prevent an employee who does not want to make contributions under the bill from working 59 days or less in a quarter for a single employer, and then ceasing work or going to work for another employer, thus avoiding coverage under the law?

Mr. MILLIKIN. My answer is that there is no provision of the bill which would prevent a practice of that kind.

Mr. HOLLAND. My eighth question is this: Referring to the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], on page 8494 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 13, 1950, to the effect that migrant agricultural labor is not brought under insurance coverage by the pending measure, is it not true that this statement is based entirely on the provision which may be referred to as the 60 days and $50 provision in section 210 (a) (1) (A), which I have quoted into the RECORD? In other words, there is no express reference to migrant agricultural labor, as such, by the terms of the pending measure, is there? Also, is it not true that part-time employees are equally excluded, along with migrant employees, under that provision?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Answering the first question first, let me say that I do not recall any specific reference in the bill to migrant agricultural labor, described as such. The Senator is entirely correct when he says that the basic definition, that which excludes a migrant worker from the coverage of the bill, is in the language he has quoted.

Mr. HOLLAND. That is, in the 60-day and $50 provision?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes; in the 60-day and $50 provision.

Mr. HOLLAND. Am I also correct in saying that, by the same provision, part-time labor—that is, labor which has not been employed 60 days in any calendar quarter and has not received $50 in such calendar quarter—is also excluded, along with migrant labor, from the coverage of the law?

Mr. MILLIKIN. That is true.

Mr. HOLLAND. My ninth question is this: Is it not true that share croppers are excluded from the coverage of the bill? If so, is it not true that this exclusion of share croppers arises entirely under the cash-remuneration requirement in section 210 (a) (1) (A)? In other words, is it true that there is no express reference to share croppers, as such, by the terms of the pending measure?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I do not recall any description of share croppers, as such, in the pending measure.

Mr. HOLLAND. Is it true that they are excluded from coverage, as stated by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], by the use of the words "cash remuneration," which is required to constitute any regular employee?

Mr. MILLIKIN. That is correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. My tenth question is this: When is the employer privileged to begin making deductions for social-security tax from the compensation of the employee? We have received a considerable number of requests on this point from vegetable producers in the State of Florida, who, recognizing the fact that it will not be known until late in the quarter whether an employee is covered or is not covered, are disturbed about the question of whether they should begin to make deductions to cover the employee's contributions to this tax at the first employment, or only after the 60 days of labor have been completed, thus qualifying the worker to come within the term of "regular agricultural employee."

Mr. MILLIKIN. As a matter of right, as distinguished from what might be an agreement between the employer and the employee, I would say there is no right to make a deduction until 60 days have been worked in a calendar quarter. That leaves, I suggest, sufficient protection to the employer.

I assume that the Senator has in mind, perhaps, some worker who may be working for 60 days, being paid, we will say, weekly, and perhaps disappearing before the proper deductions are made. I think that, as a practical matter, the last week's work, or whatever the number of days that would be involved, would provide sufficient wages out of which the employer could make his deduction. The reason for being required to wait that long is that the worker has a right to quit after the first week, or at any time short of a full quarter, and it would be unfair to make a deduction from his first week's pay, if he left after that time, before completing 60 days' work in the quarter, because he would not be owing anything; and, on the other hand, the employer is not obligated to make any reports or payments until after the man has worked 60 days.

Mr. HOLLAND. As another part of the same question, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator this: If deductions for the tax are made by an employer, and the employee works less than 60 days, is it not true that the employee is entitled to a refund under such conditions?

Mr. MILLIKIN. He certainly would be. That carries me back to a remark I made a moment ago. If by agreement between employer and employee, the employer were entitled to take out the tax week by week, obviously I should think such an agreement would require a rebate of the money. Otherwise, I do not believe the question arises, because, as I suggested before, the employer has no reporting obligation and no paying obligation until after the 60-day period during the quarter, and he will have the opportunity, I suggest, let us say during the last week, of having sufficient money due the employee to make the necessary withholding.

Mr. HOLLAND. My eleventh question is this——

Mr. MILLIKIN. May I make one more suggestion?

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall be glad if the Senator will.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The amount is 1½ percent of the rate of the worker's wages, and as a practical matter that 1½ percent, applied to any wages which might be received by the type of employee the Senator is discussing, would allow, perhaps even out of one day's employment, considerable leeway for the deduction at the end of the quarter.

Mr. HOLLAND. My eleventh question is this: Referring to section 210 (a) (1) (A), line 24, page 240, through line 7, page 241 of the printed bill, is it not true that under this provision agricultural workers working side by side in a farmer's field will be differentiated as to whether they are subject to social-security benefits by virtue of the number of days they have worked for that particular employer during the previous calendar quarter?

Mr. MILLIKIN. That is entirely correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. My twelfth question is this: I note that there is no definition of the word "employer" stated in the bill itself, as there is of the word "employee," and of most all the other terms. Will the Senator state for the RECORD the definition of the word "employer" which he would regard as appropriate for the purposes of this bill?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I should not want to attempt an off-the-cuff definition of the word, but I think that, in common parlance, it has a very well-defined meaning. It is the man who pays the wages, and it is the man who has control and direction over the employee's labor.

Mr. HOLLAND. I will not press the Senator, but will he say for the record that the proper definition of this term for the purposes of this bill would be the common-law definition as the same may be affected by any of the specific verbiage of the bill?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes; I would say so.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator has been extremely patient, which I appreciate.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I wish to express my appreciation of the very finely phrased and important questions which the Senator from Florida has propounded.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. It seemed to the Senator from Florida, in view of the fact that only a small fraction of the total of agricultural workers was to be covered under the terms of the proposed bill, and that many of its terms were new to the body of our law, that it was highly appropriate, if not necessary, that this entire matter be explored for the protection of the worker and for the protection of employers in the agricultural field, particularly under the statement of the Senator from Georgia, that the committee had sought to confine itself, by the additional and partial coverage given in that field under this bill, to such coverage as could be effected without bringing undue hardship or complexity or administrative difficulties upon the farmers of the Nation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think the Senator's questions are especially pertinent, due to the conditions that exist in his own State and in other States which have somewhat comparable situations, where a large amount of migrant labor is necessary for the harvesting of the crops.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. I should like to ask one additional question, because I think it is wholly pertinent. So far as migrant labor is concerned, is it correct that there is nothing whatever to exclude migrant labor by reason of the mere fact that the workers travel from place to place, provided that they stay in any one place of employment under one particular agricultural employer so long as to have worked 60 days and to have received $50 in cash remuneration during any calendar quarter, as set forth in the bill?

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator is entirely correct. In asking his question, I am sure he has in mind what happens in the second quarter, where a man has complied with the conditions affecting the first quarter. He does not have to work 60 days in the second quarter; he can work any amount of time, if he gets $50 during that time.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. The real purpose of my question was to make it clear that there was no purpose on the part of the committee, nor will there be any purpose on the part of the Senate if it passes this measure—which I hope it will—to exclude any workers or their families from the coverage of the law by reason of the mere fact that they travel from place to place in following the crops and therefore come within the accepted category of the term "migrant" or "migratory agricultural workers."

Mr. MILLIKIN. They would be clearly included in the coverage if they met the 60-day and $50 per quarter requirements.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am deeply appreciative of the kindness and the patience of the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thank the Senator very much.

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next order of business is the call of the calendar.

Mr. STENNIS. Mr. President, not being able to tell the time at which the questions were going to be concluded, quite a number of Senators are absent. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hickenlooper	Maybank
Benton	Hill	Millikin
Bridges	Holland	Mundt
Butler	Hunt	Myers
Cain	Ives	Neely
Chapman	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Chavez	Johnson, Tex.	Robertson
Connally	Kefauver	Russell
Cordon	Kem	Saltonstall
Darby	Kerr	Schoeppel
Donnell	Kilgore	Smith, Maine
Dworshak	Knowland	Smith, N. J.
Eastland	Leahy	Stennis

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries, and he announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On June 12, 1950:

S. 947. An act for the relief of the Baggett Transportation Co. Inc.;

S. 1510. An act for the relief of James I. Bartley;

S. 1798. An act for the relief of Mrs. Minda Moore; and

S. 2646. An act for the relief of the Articaire Refrigeration Co.

On June 13, 1950:

S. 1863. An act for the relief of Fremont Rider; and

S. 2385. An act for the relief of Edward C. Ritchie

On June 14, 1950:

S. 274. An act for the relief of Constantin E. Aramescu;

S. 1423. An act for the relief of Alex Morningstar;

S. 1856. An act for the relief of Sisters Maria Rita Rossi; Maria Domenica Paone, Rachele Orlando, Assunta Roselli, Rosa Innocenti, and Maria Mantinelli;

S. 1959. An act to commemorate Jim White and his contribution to the early history of Carlsbad Caverns, in the State of New Mexico, and for other purposes;

S. 2108. An act for the relief of Italo Vespa de Chellis;

S. 2117. An act to provide for the designation of the reservoir to be formed by the Davis Dam on the Colorado River as Lake Mohave;

S. 2274. An act to provide for the addition of certain lands to El Morro National Monument, in the State of New Mexico, and for other purposes;

S. 2969. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Commerce; and

S. 3226. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Interior.

On June 15, 1950:

S. 356. An act for the relief of Hugo Geiger;

S. 404. An act for the relief of Emma L Jackson;

S. 749. An act for the relief of Ferd H Gibler;

S. 977. An act for the relief of Jacques Yedid, Henriette Yedid, and Ethel Danielle Yedid;

S. 1693. An act for the relief of Karin Margareta Hellen and Olof Christer Hellen;

S. 1719. An act to amend section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1906, relating to the Osage Indians of Oklahoma;

S. 1739. An act to amend section 4934 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 35, sec. 78), as amended, to permit public libraries of the United States to acquire back copies of United States letters patent, and for other purposes;

S. 1929. An act for the relief of Anna Samudovsky;

S. 2338. An act for the relief of J. M. Arthur; and

S. 3093. An act to amend section 82 of the Hawaiian Organic Act relating to the Supreme Court of the Territory of Hawaii and temporary vacancies therein.

DELIVERED-PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 184)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying bill, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed:

To the Senate:

I am returning herewith, without my approval, S. 1008, a bill to define the application of the Federal Trade Commission Act and the Clayton Act to certain pricing practices.

It is the purpose of this bill to eliminate confusion and uncertainty under these acts regarding the legality of freight absorption and the sale of goods at delivered prices. Further, the bill provides a definition of the extent to which "good faith" meeting of competition is a defense against a charge of illegal price discrimination.

It is obviously desirable for laws to be as clear as possible. After careful study, however, I am convinced that the bill would not achieve the clarification which is desired. Instead, through the introduction of new and uncertain legal terminology, and through its confusing legislative history, the bill would obscure, rather than clarify, the law. As a result, it would make it more difficult for businessmen, administrative agencies, and the courts to understand and apply the legal safeguards against monopoly and unfair competition. Moreover, the bill contains provisions which might be interpreted, after protracted litigation, to impair the effectiveness of the antitrust laws.

Because of the increasing complexity of our economic system, the laws protecting fair competition have been amended from time to time, and the judicial decisions interpreting those laws have taken account of specific situations not anticipated by those who drafted the laws originally. When further amendments of the antitrust laws are needed to meet new problems, they should be enacted in a form which clearly preserves the basic purpose of these laws—the protection of fair competition and the prevention of monopoly.

The sponsors of this bill intended to do exactly that. They were impressed by court decisions in recent years which were said by some to mean that businessmen could not absorb freight costs or quote "delivered prices" in distant markets in order to meet the prices offered by competitors. They drafted this bill in an effort to clarify that situation.

This bill, however, as it has finally emerged from the legislative process, is so far from clear that each of its major provisions is capable of widely conflicting interpretations. Members of Congress are usually in substantial agreement about the meaning of proposed legislation, even though they may differ widely about whether or not it is desirable. In debating this bill they have expressed substantial agreement about what is desirable and yet have differed widely about the bill's meaning and effects. There is every reason to believe that if S. 1008 were to become law there would be as much uncertainty about its meaning in the business community and the administrative agencies of the Government as there has been in the Congress.

Section 1 of this bill is designed to make clear that it is not unlawful under the Federal Trade Commission Act for businessmen acting independently to absorb freight and to sell at delivered prices. The sponsors of the bill in the Senate interpreted section 1 as a mere declaration of existing law. On the other hand, the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives has interpreted certain provisions of this section in a manner which apparently would change existing law. Still other Members of both Houses of Congress interpret the bill as permitting the resumption of basing-point practices recently found to be illegal.

Sections 2 and 3 are intended to clarify the meaning of the Clayton Act with respect to certain price discriminations, particularly those resulting from freight absorption and delivered pricing. In so doing, these sections undertake to define the extent to which the good faith of a seller in meeting a competitor's price is a defense against a charge of illegal price discrimination. Supporters of the bill in both the Senate and the House have interpreted sections 2 and 3 as increasing a seller's freedom to meet a competitor's price in good faith—regardless of resulting injury to competition—by removing what they regard as undue restrictions in existing law. On the other hand, it has also been stated in support of the bill that these sections would have a contrary effect. Opponents of the bill in both Houses of Congress have said that these same sections would have the practical effect of nullifying the Robinson-Patman Act, with its protections against ruthless price discrimination.

In the light of these conflicting interpretations, many years of complex litigation would be required to give the provisions of S. 1008 clear and specific content. This is certain to be a slow and difficult process. Meanwhile, some individuals might be encouraged to resume practices which are now prohibited. During this period, doubt cast on the previous decisions of the courts would impair effective enforcement of the antitrust laws.

Even more serious is the risk that this bill would eventually be interpreted to reduce the protection afforded the public by the antitrust laws. These laws have been in effect a long time and have acquired specific content through interpretation by the courts. They provide safeguards against practices which would tend to destroy our free competitive economy. The Sherman Act is directed against monopolies and conspiracies in restraint of trade. The Federal Trade Commission Act established an administrative agency with authority to prevent trade practices which, if not checked, would unduly suppress competition or tend to create monopoly. The Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, prohibits a number of specific, injurious trade practices. In particular, this law protects small enterprises against ruthless price discrimination.

Because the meaning of S. 1008 is so uncertain, no one can accurately foretell how its enactment would change the content of these laws. The bill might handicap the Federal Trade Commission in proving the existence of a conspiracy involving use of a delivered pricing system. The Commission and the courts now consider a great number of factors in determining whether there has been an unlawful conspiracy to fix prices in a particular case. Among these factors are the operation of freight absorption and basing-point systems as they affect pricing and competition. The courts have frequently found these to be the means by which organized price fixing is accomplished. Yet it is quite possible that S. 1008 would be interpreted to create a preferred status for these practices, giving them immunity from consideration in conspiracy proceedings.

Furthermore, S. 1008 might jeopardize the Commission's ability to stop unfair discriminations. At the present time a principal test of unjustified price discrimination under the Clayton Act is whether the effect "may be" substantially to lessen competition. In a number of cases the courts have upheld the legislative intent of the original Clayton Act to make this test cover discriminations which have not yet reached the stage of actually suppressing competition but could reasonably be expected to do so. S. 1008, however, provides that certain price discriminations are illegal if the effect on competition "would be" such that competition "will be" substantially reduced. In interpreting this new language the courts may feel compelled to require proof that damage to competition is already occurring, or will certainly follow, before discriminations can be stopped.

These are risks, not certainties. But there would be no justification for taking such risks unless the existing legal situation were so confused as to appreciably hamper business operations and there were no alternative methods for resolving these difficulties. At the present time, this is clearly not the case.

The issues this legislation is designed to resolve have been under intensive consideration by the Congress and the public for 2 years. During this period the relevant court decisions and administrative policies which gave rise to this bill have been thoroughly reexamined. In a recent decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, considerable light was thrown on the legality of freight absorption under the Federal Trade Commission Act. In addition, the Commission has issued a number of statements designed to make clear its interpretations of the law. As a result, much of the earlier uncertainty has been eliminated. Thus it is quite clear that there is no bar to freight absorption or delivered prices as such. Still further clarification of the antitrust laws can be expected when decisions are reached in a number of cases now under consideration by the Federal Trade Commission and the courts.

The recent court decisions were effective in eliminating certain clear abuses of competition. The sponsors of this bill recognize the merit of these decisions. In none of these cases have legitimate competitive practices been prevented by the courts. Moreover, industries affected by these court decisions have demonstrated their ability to adjust to the law with respect to the absorption of freight and delivered pricing, as now interpreted, without apparent injury to themselves or to the economy.

I recognize that businessmen have been concerned lest they be penalized for perfectly sensible and appropriate competitive action. I believe their concern is unwarranted. If in the future there should be clear evidence to the contrary, the law should, of course, be changed.

On the basis of the present evidence, however, I am convinced that no such change is necessary, and that in attempting to affirm what is already true, the bill goes further and would hamper, instead of help, the preservation of fair competition.

When reasonable and informed men arrive at such widely divergent interpretations of a piece of legislation as in this case, it is impossible to predict the direction which future court decisions would take. Even if all interpretations served to maintain full protection under our antitrust laws, the intervening period of uncertainty might jeopardize enforcement of these laws for a decade or more. But the fact is that these interpretations, when they came, might necessarily weaken the present laws. I am convinced, therefore, that the enactment of S. 1008 would not be in the public interest.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN CONTRACTORS EMPLOYED IN CONSTRUCTION OF UNITED STATES APPRAISERS BUILDING, SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 185)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying bill, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return herewith, without my approval, S. 794, "for the relief of certain contractors employed in connection with the construction of the United States Appraisers Building, San Francisco, Calif."

This enactment directs the payment of the 17 claimants named therein of varying amounts, totaling $118,808.38 in compensation for monetary losses sustained by them in performing contracts or subcontracts in connection with the construction for the Federal Government of the United States Appraisers Building in San Francisco.

The contract for this construction was entered into in July 1940 between the Public Works Administration and the Clinton Construction Co., as the general contractor. The latter, in turn, subcontracted much of the construction work to the claimants in this case.

Construction of the building commenced in 1940. The contractors engaged in the construction of the building continued work pursuant to the commitments of their contracts and the building was completed in 1945. While the prime contractor and some subcontractors are said to have realized a profit, other subcontractors, including the claimants named in this enactment, incurred losses in this undertaking. The losses were attributed to the rise in cost of materials, the shortage and inefficiency of labor, delays, and lack of effective priorities, all induced by the emergency conditions of the time.

It has long been the accepted rule that the Federal Government should not be expected to underwrite the success of those who engage in contractual relationships with it. Such a policy is essential to the orderly and successful administration of government. Under our competitive free-enterprise system, the risks of loss should be just as much present in dealings with the Government as they are in dealings between private individuals and concerns. However, the Congress did take cognizance of the plight of some contractors with the Government who were obliged to carry out their commitments in the face of rising costs and other harassments of war conditions. In 1946 it enacted the so-called Lucas Act (Public Law 657, 79th Cong.), which was designed to afford relief, under certain circumstances, to contractors who suffered losses in discharging contracts for work, supplies, or services furnished the Government between September 16, 1940, and August 14, 1945.

The Lucas Act, general in form and application, prescribed standards to govern the disposition of the claims of contractors who filed under its authority. Among other conditions which it imposed, the act required a showing that the claimant suffered a net loss on all contracts and subcontracts with the Government during the prescribed period. Some of the claimants involved in the instant bill sought relief under the Lucas Act, but their claims were rejected since they had not incurred a net loss on all of their contracts and subcontracts in connection with Government work during the statutory period. The remaining claimants did not file under the act, presumably because they could not meet either the statutory test of an over-all loss or other terms of that legislation.

Failing in their efforts to secure relief under the provisions of general law, the claimants next sought the private relief provided in this bill. In effect, therefore, this measure proposes, for the benefit of a limited few, special treatment outside the framework of general law applicable to Government contracts. Specifically, it would depart from the rationale of the Lucas Act in its proposal to make these claimants whole on one contract without taking into consideration profits realized by them on all contracts performed for the Government during the war period. These contractors, it seems to me, ask that they be removed from the risk of any loss in having performed the contracts in question. What they seek is not only contrary to the principles of our free enterprise system but it would place the Government in the unreasonable and unique position of being a guarantor against losses by those who engaged in business relations with it.

In the light of the foregoing considerations, I have felt obliged to withhold my approval from this enactment.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. Is the call of the calendar next in order under the unanimous-consent agreement?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call of the calendar is now in order, beginning at Order of Business 1788, Senate bill 3571.

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY OF MARITIME COMMISSION

The bill (S. 3571) to continue the authority of the Maritime Commission under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, may we have a short explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). An explanation is desired. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the bill extends the time and provides the conditions pursuant to which war-built cargo and passenger vessels may be sold and chartered. Authority to sell and charter the vessels under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946 terminates on June 30, 1950. The bill extends authorization to sell to December 31, 1950. Authority to charter vessels under the existing provisions of the 1946 act is extended to September 30, 1950, in order to provide for the orderly liquidation of outstanding charters.

The bill also provides for the continuation to December 31, 1950, of the authority of the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to grant waivers of navigation and vessel-inspection laws except in the case of laws regulating employment of aliens or requiring a vessel to have a full crew.

Section 5 of the bill will permit the operation of Canadian ore vessels in the domestic iron-ore trade on the Great Lakes.

Sections 2 and 3 of the bill provide for the continued charter of war-built and cargo and passenger vessels after September 30, 1950, under the following conditions: (a) In time of national emergency when the requisition power of the Government becomes operative; (b) whenever in the public interest cargo vessels are required for use in either a foreign or domestic trade which is not adequately served and for which privately owned vessels are not available on reasonable conditions and at reasonable rates; and (c) authority to charter war-built and non-war-built passenger vessels is authorized under title VII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. With reference to the waiving of certain requirements, does the bill provide that when a waiver is entered into it will be made a matter of record?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. It provides for a record by the Commandant of the Coast Guard. That follows as a matter of form.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I wanted to be sure about that phase of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That follows as a matter of form.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. Does the bill grant any additional authority or does it merely extend authority which has heretofore been granted?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. It does not grant any additional authority. It extends authority, but it imposes a limitation to be applied after the extension has expired.

Mr. CORDON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the provision in section 3 for a public hearing as a condition for chartering war-built vessels under special conditions means an opportunity to be heard orally and present arguments to the new Maritime Board. It does not contemplate that proceedings shall be fully judicial in character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with amendments, on page 1, line 6, after the word "after", to strike out "June 30, 1951" and insert "December 31, 1950"; in line 7, after the word "contract", to strike out "or" and insert "of"; in the same line, after the word "after", to strike out "December 31" and insert "September 30"; on page 2, line 8, after the word "the", to strike out "Commission" and insert "Secretary of Commerce"; in line 9, after the word "after", to strike out "January 1, 1951" and insert "October 1, 1950"; in line 13, after the word "the", to strike out "Commission may charter"; in line 14, after the word "by", to strike out "it" and insert "the United States"; in line 15, after the word "on", to strike out "December 31, 1950" and insert "September 30, 1950, may be chartered"; in line 17, after the words "of the", to strike out "Commission" and insert "Federal Maritime Board"; in line 22, after the word "made", to insert "by the Secretary of Commerce"; on page 3, line 1, after the word "the", to strike out "Commission" and insert "Federal Maritime Board"; in line 4, after the word "charters", to insert "and shall have certified its findings to the Secretary of Commerce"; in line 7, after the word "the", to strike out "Commission" and insert "Secretary of Commerce"; in line 9, after the word "by", to strike out "it" and insert "the United States"; in the same line, after the word "on", to strike out "December 31" and insert "September 30"; in line 19, after the word "until", to strike out "June 30, 1951" and insert "December 31"; in line 20, after the word "That", to strike out "after June 30, 1950, the Commandant shall not waive compliance with those sections of the navigation and vessel-inspection laws requiring the employment of American citizens as officers and crew members and limiting the employment of aliens" and insert "nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to grant a waiver for the employment of alien seamen, or a waiver permitting a vessel to sail with less than its specified compliment on board", and on page 4, after line 6, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 27 of the act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 999), as amended by act of April 11, 1935 (49 Stat. 154), and by act of July 2, 1935 (49 Stat. 442), or the provisions of any other act or regulation, vessels of Canadian registry shall be permitted to transport iron ore between United States ports on the Great Lakes during the period from the date of enactment of this act to December 31, 1950, or until such earlier time as the President by order may designate.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 14 of the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. No contract of sale shall be made under this act after December 31, 1950, and no contract of charter shall be made under this act after September 30, 1950, except as provided for charter under section 5 (e)."

SEC. 2. The fourth sentence of section 11 (a) of such act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "A vessel placed in such reserve shall in no case be used for commercial operation, except that any such vessel may be used during any period in which vessels may be requisitioned under section 902 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, and that any such vessel may be used under a bareboat charter entered into pursuant to authority vested in the Secretary of Commerce on or after October 1, 1950."

SEC. 3. Section 5 of such act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof subsections to read as follows:

"(e) Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 11 and 14 of this act, as amended, the war-built cargo vessels owned by the United States on September 30, 1950, may be chartered pursuant to this act for bareboat use in any service which in the opinion of the Federal Maritime Board is required in the public interest and is not adequately served, and for which privately owned vessels are not available for charter by private operators on reasonable conditions and at reasonable rates for use in such service. No charters shall be made by the Secretary of Commerce under authority of this subsection until the Federal Maritime Board shall have given due notice to all interested parties and shall have afforded such parties an opportunity for a public hearing on such charters and shall have certified its findings to the Secretary of Commerce.

"(f) Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 11 and 14 of this act the Secretary of Commerce may charter any passenger vessel, whether or not war-built, owned by the United States on September 30, 1950, pursuant to title VII of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended."

SEC. 4. Section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution authorizing the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to waive compliance with the navigation and vessel-inspection laws administered by the Coast Guard," approved March 31, 1947 (Public Law 27, 80th Cong.), as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. The authority granted by this resolution shall remain in force only until December 31, 1950: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the Commandant of the United States Coast Guard to grant a waiver for the employment of alien seamen, or a waiver permitting a vessel to sail with less than its specified complement on board."

SEC. 5. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 27 of the act of June 5, 1920 (41 Stat. 999), as amended by act of April 11, 1935 (49 Stat. 154), and by act of July 2, 1935 (49 Stat. 442), or the provisions of any other act or regulation, vessels of Canadian registry shall be permitted to transport iron ore between United States ports on the Great Lakes during the period from the date of enactment of this act to December 31, 1950, or until such earlier time as the President by order may designate.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is there anything in the bill which would exempt or have the effect of in any way exempting the Maritime Commission from the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No, there is nothing in the bill to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to continue the authority of the Secretary of Commerce under the Merchant Ship Sales Act of 1946, and for other purposes."

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 6826) to provide for the common defense through the registration and classification of certain male persons, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EXTENSION OF THE RUBBER ACT OF 1948

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7579) to extend the Rubber Act of 1948 (Public Law 469, 80th Cong.) and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services, with amendments in line 6, after "April 1", to strike out "1952" and insert "1951"; in line 8, after "January 15", to strike out "1953" and insert "1952", and in line 11, after "June 30", to strike out "1953" and insert "1952."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM FOR RESERVE COMPONENTS OF ARMED FORCES

The bill (S. 960) to provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I note that the bill carries an amount of $135 000,000. May we have an explanation of the bill, please?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, together with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] I was a member of the subcommittee which considered the bill. This is a bill concerning armories in various States for the National Guard and for the military reserves. The committee considered the bill last year, but held up action on it because the Secretary of Defense gave higher priority to other matters. This year he came back and gave the highest priority to this bill. Therefore the committee has carefully considered it and worked out provisions which are agreeable to the National Guard leaders and to the Secretary of Defense, and, so far as I know, to the various States.

The problem is that the National Guard is now composed of 390,000 men. The National Guard is larger than the needs of the States would require. The Guard also has air forces which are not necessarily purely for State purposes. Therefore the problem is how to provide facilities adequate to take care of the necessary equipment that is now turned over by the United States Government to the National Guard, also to give the guard facilities sufficiently large in which to train.

The original suggestion called for $700,000,000 over a period of years. The committee cut it down to a period of 3 years, and to a $135,000,000 maximum, that is, $35,000,000 for this year, and $50,000,000 authorizations for each of the next 2 years. It did this because it believed the situation was so fluid that it was much better to reexamine the situation 3 years from now and have Congress again consider the matter, rather than go into a very extensive building program which might become inadequate or out of date.

The bill gives the Federal Government control over the buildings which it constructs. It makes the Federal Government contribute 75 percent to existing State armories which may be enlarged. It gives the final decision as to the location of a unit of the National Guard to the Secretary of Defense after he has talked with and notified the Governor of the State, who can cite objections if he so desires.

Mr. President, I believe the bill safeguards the national interest in its relation to the States. I believe it protects the interest of the National Guard. General Reckord and his group approve of it in its present form. I believe we have cut it down sufficiently so that if conditions change there will be no waste of funds. The bill authorizes a large sum of money, $135,000,000. But it is the result of 2 years work, and I think the situation is protected in every way, and that the amount involved is necessary at this time for the national defense.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts if there is an emergency with respect to this measure in certain sections of the country, in the interest of national defense?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The only emergency, I will say to the distinguished Senator from Kansas, is that the equipment the Government now supplies to the National Guard is often left out in the open because of a lack of housing facilities. It is not under cover in a number of instances. Furthermore, the National Guard has grown so large that there are not adequate facilities in which to train. The Navy has built Quonset huts in various States to take care of its needs. The Navy is not involved in this measure. Its needs are adequately taken care of. The National Guard officers believe the facilities provided by the bill are necessary for the units and the air forces of the Guard if they are to be adequately trained and if their equipment is to be properly covered and protected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 960) to provide for the construction, rehabilitation, expansion, conversion, and joint utilization of buildings, structures, utilities, and other facilities, including the acquisition of land, for the Reserve components of the National Military Establishment of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That this act may be cited as the "National Defense Facilities Act of 1950".

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this act to make provision for—

(a) the acquisition by purchase, lease, transfer, construction, expansion, rehabilitation, or conversion of such facilities as may be necessary for the proper development, training operation, and maintenance of units of the Reserve components of the armed services of the United States; and

(b) the joint utilization of such facilities by units of two or more such Reserve components, and in time of war or national emergency by such units and other units of the Armed Forces of the United States or any other use by the Federal Government, to the greatest practicable extent in the interest of efficiency and economy.

SEC. 3. Subject to the provision of section 4 of this act, the Secretary of Defense is authorized, in an aggregate amount not in excess of $135,000,000 which shall be available for obligation purposes at a rate not in excess of $35,000,000 for the fiscal year 1951 and $50,000,000 for each of the two succeeding fiscal years, to—

(a) acquire by purchase, lease, or transfer, construct, expand, rehabilitate, convert, and equip such facilities as he shall determine to be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act;

(b) contribute to any State such funds as he shall determine to be necessary to expand, rehabilitate, or convert facilities owned by such State to the extent required for the joint utilization of such facilities; and

(c) contribute to any State such funds for the acquisition, construction, expansion, rehabilitation, or conversion by such State of such additional facilities as he shall determine to have been made essential by any increase in strength of the National Guard of the United States or the Air National Guard of the United States.

SEC. 4. (a) No expenditure or contribution shall be made for any facility pursuant to this act until it shall have been determined by the Secretary of Defense that—

(1) the number of units of Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States located or to be located in the community or area within which such facility is to be provided does not exceed the number which reasonably can be expected to be maintained at authorized strength, taking into account the number of persons residing in such community or area who are qualified for membership in such reserve units; and

(2) the plan or program under which such facility is to be provided makes the maximum practicable provision for the joint utilization of such facilities.

(b) No unit of the National Guard of the United States or the Air National Guard of the United States shall be withdrawn from any community or area, nor shall the location of any such unit be changed, pursuant to any authority conferred by this act, until the governor of the State within which such unit is situated shall have been consulted with regard to such withdrawal or change of location.

(c) Title to all real or personal property acquired under section 3 (a) of this act shall be vested in the United States. All facilities provided pursuant to such section shall be administered by the Secretary of Defense, who may (1) permit any such facility to be used from time to time by persons or organizations other than members or units of the armed services under leases or other agreements as the Secretary shall deem appropriate, and (2) cover payments received under such leases or agreements into the Treasury to the credit of the appropriation or appropriations from which the cost of maintenance, including providing of utilities and services, is paid, but the Secretary shall at no time permit any disposition or use to be made of such facilities which will interfere with their use for the administration and training of units of the Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States, or in time of war or national emergency by other units of the Armed Forces of the United States or any other use by the Federal Government.

(d) Each contribution made pursuant to section 3 (b) or 3 (c) of this act shall be subject to such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Defense shall deem necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act: Provided, That except as agreed at the time the contribution is made the facilities provided through contributions made pursuant to section 3 (c) of this act shall be subject to joint utilization only to the extent deemed practicable by the State concerned. No contribution shall be made under section 3 (c) for any facility in an amount exceeding 75 percent of the cost of the additional or improved facilities to be constructed.

(e) Each State which shall have acquired, constructed, expanded, rehabilitated, or converted any facility with any funds contributed under sections 3 (b) and 3 (c) of this act may (1) permit such facility to be used from time to time by persons or organizations other than members or units of the armed services under such leases or other agreements as such State shall deem appropriate, and (2) apply the sums received under such leases or agreements to defray in whole or in part the cost of maintaining such facility, but, except as agreed at the time such contribution is made, or by subsequent modifications of the agreement, at no time shall such State permit any disposition or use to be made of such facility which will interfere with its use for the administration and training of units of the Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States, or in time of war or national emergency of other units of the Armed Forces of the United States or any other use by the Federal Government.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of Defense may delegate all or any part of the authority conferred or the duties imposed upon him by this act without relieving himself of the responsibility therefor to such department, agency, officer, or officers of the Department of Defense as he may designate from time to time.

SEC. 6. As used in this act, the term—

(a) "facility" includes an interest in land, any armory or other structure together with any improvement thereto, and any storage or other facility normally required for the administration and training of any unit of any Reserve component of the Armed Forces of the United States;

(b) "State" includes (1) any State or Territory of the United States, any political subdivision thereof, any tax-supported agency therein, or any military unit situated therein; (2) Puerto Rico; and (3) the District of Columbia;

(c) "Reserve component of the armed forces of the United States" shall include—

(1) the National Guard of the United States;

(2) the Air National Guard of the United States;

(3) the Organized Reserve Corps;

(4) the United States Naval Reserve;

(5) the United States Marine Corps Reserve;

(6) the United States Air Force Reserve; and

(7) the Coast Guard Reserve; and

(d) "joint utilization" shall mean the occupancy or use of any facility by units of two or more Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States.

SEC. 7. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act. When any act whereby any such appropriation is made so provides, such sum shall remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the acquisition, construction, expansion, rehabilitation, conversion, and joint utilization of facilities necessary for the administration and training of units for the Reserve components of the Armed Forces of the United States for fiscal years 1951, 1952, and 1953, and for other purposes."

SUSPENSION OF DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 95) favoring the suspension of deportation of certain aliens was considered and agreed to, as follows:

GLUCKIN CORP.

The bill (H. R. 3498) for the relief of the Gluckin Corp. was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that I note the amount involved is $11,640.90. I have just listened with considerable interest to the message of the President relating to Senate bill 794. I should like to have the sponsors of the bill now pending indicate to me if, by any possible chance, the relief asked for the Gluckin Corp. of $11,540.90 comes within the purview of the President's message.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An explanation is desired.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the observation of the Senator from Kansas is entirely timely. I am of the opinion that the bill may avoid some of the reasons given for the veto in the San Francisco case. However, I think it is worth while that the Senate pass the bill; and if the President finds objection to it he may veto it.

This is a private claim bill, growing out of war contracts. The amount involved is $11,540.

A small portion of the total, $303, represents items produced by the contractor in excess of the amount called for by the contract, but delivered to and retained by the Government. The rest of the total consists of items for reimbursement of liquidated damages heretofore deducted and retained by the Government.

The enactment of this bill is opposed by the Secretary of the Army. The bill was considered by a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WITHERS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], who reported it favorably to the full committee, and the subcommittee report was accepted. Certain items to which specific objection was voiced by the Secretary of the Army have been stricken from the bill in the House of Representatives.

As Senators probably know, the practice of including clauses in Government contracts providing for liquidated damages has been abandoned because it was found that such clauses were unworkable and unfair. Congress has adopted the policy of reimbursing contractors who had been forced to pay liquidated damages where there was no direct fault or negligence on the contractor's part. The report of the committee cites several precedents in this regard, among them a payment in the amount of $104,511, which, I believe, is the largest sum previously paid in a single bill of this nature.

The committee is informed that this is probably the last claim of this nature which will come before the Congress, in view of the fact that the War Department has not required the inclusion of liquidated damage provisions in its contracts for the past 8 or 9 years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 3498) for the relief of Gluckin Corp. was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CALVIN E. CRANFORD

The bill (H. R. 4100) for the relief of Calvin E. Cranford was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MR. AND MRS. C. S. WALKER

The bill (H. R. 4163) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Walker was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. May we have an explanation of this measure?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An explanation is desired.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is the case of a man and wife, living in Imperial County, Calif., who suffered damage to real property and loss of personal property as a result of noncombat activities of the Army. The loss and damage occurred under circumstances which indicated that military personnel were responsible, but the particular person or persons responsible were never identified.

The Department of the Army has stated it would have no objection to approval of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 4163) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. C. S.

Walker was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. ELIZABETH H. WHITNEY

The bill (H. R. 4960) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth H. Whitney was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN TWEIT

The bill (H. R. 5979) for the relief of John Tweit was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. FUJIKO CHICHIE IMBERT, WIFE, AND ROBERT IMBERT, JR., SON OF AN AMERICAN SOLDIER

The bill (H. R. 6652) for the relief of Mrs. Fujiko Chichie Imbert, wife, and Robert Imbert, Jr., son of an American soldier, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOUIE GAM YEAN

The bill (H. R. 7050) for the relief of Louie Gam Yean was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KAZUKO MIYAMA AKANA AND CHANG KING AKANA

The bill (H. R. 7065) for the relief of Kazuko Miyama Akana and Chang King Akana was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETSUKO AMANO

The bill (H. R. 7066) for the relief of Setsuko Amano was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KOTO KOGAMI KITSU AND JEANNETTE AKEMI KITSU

The bill (H. R. 7073) for the relief of Koto Kogami Kitsu and Jeannette Akemi Kitsu was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NOBUKO MAEDA

The bill (H. R. 7199) for the relief of Nobuko Maeda was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. BERNARD SMITH

The bill (H. R. 7254) for the relief of Mrs. Bernard Smith was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to remove the racial barrier to admission into the United States for the wife of a native-born United States citizen.

Special legislation is needed because the wife in this case is half Burmese, and therefore is subject to exclusion on grounds of racial ineligibility to naturalization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 7254) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. WILLARD THULIN (FORMERLY JUTTA KONO)

The bill (H. R. 7362) for the relief of Mrs. Willard Thulin (formerly Jutta Kono) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUZUKO TAKANASHI

The bill (H. R. 7416) for the relief of Suzuko Takanashi was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAVID GEORGE CALLAWAY

The bill (H. R. 7656) for the relief of David George Callaway was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MITSUKO ITO

The bill (H. R. 7658) for the relief of Mitsuko Ito was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. AKIKO OSADA GUSTAFSON

The bill (H. R. 7682) for the relief of Mrs. Akiko Osada Gustafson was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIM OF AUF DER HEIDE-ARAGONA, INC., AND OTHERS

The bill (H. R. 1606) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of Auf der Heide-Aragona, Inc., and certain of its subcontractors against the United States was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me make an inquiry. There is a committee amendment, and then there is an amendment which I desire to offer, by way of clarification. I should like to have the distinguished Senator from Nevada comment on it, if he will, for I understand that it has been submitted to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, in line 9, after the word "Maryland", to strike out the colon and the following proviso: "Provided, That if the said court shall find that the United States through any of its departments or agencies delayed the issuance of priorities which resulted in subjecting the said contractor and its subcontractors to additional costs, including overhead expense, or if the said court shall find the United States, through any such department or agency, including Defense Plant Corporation, sponsored any work program in the general area of the contractor's work which rendered it impossible for the contractor and its subcontractors to achieve that degree of labor performance which they would have achieved had any such work program not existed, or made it necessary for them to pay higher wages for such labor as was available than they would otherwise have had to pay, and that these conditions subjected the contractor and its subcontractors to additional cost and overhead expense, then the said court shall in either event enter judgment for the contractor and its subcontractors in the amount of such additional costs, including a reasonable allowance for profit based upon such excess of cost and overhead expense."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, by way of explanation of House bill 1606, let me say that the purpose of the bill is to confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claim of a contractor and certain subcontractors, arising out of performance of a contract with the Veterans' Administration for the construction of a hospital building. The claim involves extra costs incurred under the contract, due largely to the failure of the War Production Board to issue priority certificates for necessary materials.

The claim involves disputed issues of fact, and it was the judgment of the committee that these should be passed upon by the Court of Claims.

As it passed the House, the bill contained provisions which might have prejudiced the Government in the court action. The Senate committee has deleted these provisions.

It has been suggested that the bill should be amended so as to provide in terms that its enactment carries no implication of liability on the part of the Government. No such provision was added to the bill, because it was felt by the committee that, having deleted all material prejudicial to the Government, such a provision was not needed. However, there would certainly be no objection to an amendment in this regard, if it is offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I offer and send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Before the period at the end of the bill, it is proposed to insert the following: "Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed as an inference of liability on the part of the United States Government."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PRODUCTION OF ABACÁ BY THE UNITED STATES—BILL PLACED AT THE FOOT OF THE CALENDAR

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate revert in the calendar to the consideration of Senate bill 3520, Calendar No. 1689. That measure was called during the last call of the calendar, but its consideration was objected to at that time, in my absence. I shall appreciate having an opportunity to explain the bill, if there is further objection today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request that the Senate revert in the calendar to the consideration of Senate bill 3520, Calendar No. 1689?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and let me say that I objected at the last call of the calendar, but I intend to withdraw the objection—I should like to say that, briefly, my objection to the bill is this: There is a shortage of hemp. Hemp is perhaps in time of war difficult to obtain from the Philippine Islands. The United States Government is producing a certain number of acres of hemp somewhere in Central America, and now it is desired to double that production.

I wish to ask what is the principle on which the United States Government, if there is found to be a shortage of some commodity or that there is some difficulty in transportation in connection with that commodity during wartime, goes to some foreign country and itself goes into the business of producing that commodity or article?

Hemp is only one of several hundred commodities which might be necessary in time of war. What is the justification for having the United States Government itself request the right to go into the business of producing commodities—which is not the business of the Government—and, in this case, in a foreign country? That is the question I have in mind.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I should like to say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that this is an isolated case. It is a matter in which the armed services—all three components of the Military Establishment—have manifested a great interest because of the extreme shortage of a product known as abacá, used in the manufacture of rope.

The Navy is primarily interested. Since objection was made the other day to consideration of the bill during the previous call of the calendar, representatives of the Navy have approached me and asked me to try to have this measure taken up by the Senate during this call of the calendar.

The arrangement for the production of abacá was negotiated during the war. That program is due to expire.

As chairman of the subcommittee for stockpiling, this bill came to my attention.

I can say to the distinguished Senator from Ohio that there is a great need for the stockpiling of abacá at the present time. Our past supply always came in abundance from the Philippines, but during the war the industry there was disrupted, until today the production of abacá in the Philippines is nowhere near sufficient to meet our requirements and to give us any abacá at all for stockpiling. The stockpiling of this particular item today is practically nil.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I still do not understand why, when there is a shortage of some commodity, the United States Government itself should go into the business of producing that commodity. Up to now, we have engaged in that operation in the Central American country referred to, and apparently we have shown whether abacá can be produced effectively there. Why should we now undertake to have the Government itself fill this shortage, any more than the Government should engage in operations to fill the shortage of any other agricultural commodity which may be difficult to obtain? If we are going to raise abacá, there is no reason to think that it cannot be raised in the Philippines as well as elsewhere. In fact, in connection with the matter of the restoration of the economy of the Philippines, the production of abacá there is a perfectly easy thing to do, for that is where abacá has always been grown.

The fact of the matter is that we think abacá will be difficult to obtain from the Philippines in time of war; that is the justification for raising abacá in Central America.

Is it not questionable for the United States Government itself to begin to engage in the production of a commodity which may be needed in time of war?

Mr. HUNT. I do not think so, for the reason that this is one particular item for which a contract was made during the war, and the contract is still in existence.

Mr. TAFT. However, is it not true that the present proposal is to double the production, as compared to what has been produced up to now?

Mr. HUNT. Nevertheless, in doing so, we still shall not be able to build up the stockpile we should like to create.

We have specifically provided in the bill that in no way shall it act to the disadvantage of increasing production in the Philippines. The contract is expected to be extended for only 1 year; and I would say to the Senator from Ohio that it takes several years to get a stand of abacá under production.

It is an unusual plant, which grows to a height of about 12 feet. From it fibers are taken for the manufacture of rope, which the Navy needs so badly, and for which they have been unable to find a substitute anywhere near approaching this product in its particular value for rope making. I should like to assure the Senator from Ohio that the junior Senator from Wyoming would not favor going into any wholesale business of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming to revert to Calendar No. 1689, Senate bill 3520?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, this is a special case, I suppose. I do not see the justification for it. I do not want to interfere with the United States military plans. I only enter a protest, and if this principle is to be extended I certainly shall object. But I shall not object to this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARRAN and Mr. KNOWLAND addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, we had a unanimous-consent agreement that we would go forward with the call of bills on the calendar as to which there was no objection. This bill appears on the calendar at a point prior to that where we started to call the calendar, and while I am entirely sympathetic with the passage of the bill, yet if we agree now to consider it and establish the precedent, we shall be going back of that point continually all afternoon. I should like to clean up the calendar and then take up these other measures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. HUNT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope the Senator will not object to this bill. I think the Senator from Nevada is correct and that we ought to go on through with the calendar. Then, following the conclusion of the calendar call, I should like to have the Senator from Wyoming call up this bill and perhaps debate it thoroughly. It is an important measure. But under the previous unanimous-consent agreement, we should go through the call of the calendar, otherwise, we will be going back to take up numerous other bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield the floor?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield the floor. I shall have no objection to the bill when it comes up.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the majority leader whether he has any idea when the calendar will be called again?

Mr. LUCAS. I may say to the Senator from South Carolina, I cannot tell him that.

Mr. MAYBANK. There is quite an important bill, Calendar No. 1115, House bill 1161, to provide for the conversion of national banking associations into and their merger or consolidation with State banks, and for other purposes, which I was thinking of calling up out of order. However, I realize of course that I cannot call it up until we have reached the end of the calendar, and I shall not want to do it then, if the calendar is to be called within, say, 2 weeks.

Mr. LUCAS. I should think it would be called within that time, but I cannot make any agreement about it. It all depends upon how the debate proceeds with respect to the various measures which may be pending before the Senate from time to time.

Mr. MAYBANK. I make no request. May I ask the majority leader this question, then? We shall certainly have a chance to have a vote one way or other on the bill to which I have referred before the adjournment of the Congress, shall we not?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct about that. It is an important measure. I realize its importance. If necessary, we could take it up on motion following the conclusion of the call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard to the request.

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 1689, Senate bill 3520, be placed at the foot of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

CITY OF CHESTER, ILL.—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may I ask a question or two of the senior Senator from Nevada?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has 5 minutes.

Mr. DONNELL. I may say to the Senator from Nevada that, as I understand, this is the bill which proposes to relieve the city of Chester, Ill., of all obligation to pay for the removal of the wreckage of the old bridge over the Mississippi River at Chester, Ill. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Am I also correct in understanding that on July 29, 1944, Chester bridge collapsed during a heavy windstorm?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. And that thereafter emergency action was taken by the Corps of Engineers to provide safe navigation, and about one-half the wreckage was removed; that on February 1, 1945, a permit was granted to erect falsework for reconstruction of the bridge, conditioned, however, upon removal of the remaining wreckage by the city of Chester within 18 months after the new bridge was opened to traffic. Am I correct?

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. I ask the Senator further whether the new bridge was opened to traffic on August 24, 1946, whether the city of Chester has pleaded inability to effect removal of the wreckage because of financial difficulties, and whether the only basis of this bill to relieve the city of Chester of its obligations is its financial difficulties? Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has stated the facts.

Mr. DONNELL. May I ask the Senator also whether it is not a fact that the Senator from Missouri who is now speaking has consistently objected to this bill in committee?

Mr. McCARRAN. I think the Senator has done so, consistently. The Senator is always consistent.

Mr. DONNELL. I cannot claim that virtue, Mr. President. But it is a fact that I have—and I ask the Senator to verify this—made known my objection to it. I was not present at the meeting of the committee on last Monday, because of the necessity of attending another meeting. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nevada whether it is his opinion that this bill should be passed, and whether he joins in the recommendations for its passage?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I join in the recommendation. I desire to make a very brief statement.

The claimant here is the city of Chester, Ill.

The claim does not involve the payment of any money, but only the wiping out of a charge against the city for removal of the wreckage of an old bridge over the Mississippi River at Chester.

The bridge collapsed during a heavy windstorm, without fault or negligence on the part of the city. The Army engineers removed about half the wreckage, in the interest of navigation. The following year, in 1945, a permit was granted to begin reconstruction of the bridge. The permit was conditioned upon removal of the remaining wreckage by the city of Chester. The new bridge was constructed, but the city has found it financially impossible to remove the wreckage. Because it was deemed that the wreckage menaced navigation, the Corps of Engineers removed it, and the expense of this removal was charged to the city of Chester.

The Department of the Army has reported it has no objection to enactment of the proposed legislation.

In answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri, I may say that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, together with a majority of the committee, believes the bill meritorious and requests its passage.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator has stated that this bill does not involve paying out any money. I ask whether it does not free the city of Chester of an obligation entered into by it to pay a sum in the neighborhood of from $124,000 to $130,000 for the removal of the wreckage, and that the only basis on which the city of Chester has thus far desired or expressed the desire to be relieved is of its own financial difficulty?

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has stated some of the facts. However, there are other facts which I think should be stated in connection with them. The removal of the debris, as we call it, from the river was essential for the welfare of navigation. The Army engineers found it necessary to do that. The city of Chester itself was unable to raise the money to do it, and, therefore, in order to clear the channel and make navigation more possible, the debris was removed. It seemed to me that while the city of Chester did enter into the arrangement, nevertheless, it was not the fault of the city of Chester that the bridge collapsed in the first place, and, while the city did enter into the agreement, it was unable to carry it out because of its financial condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of debate of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DONNELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the city of Chester entered into the agreement, in view of the fact that the expenditure of money has been made, I respectfully object to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. DONNELL. I reserve or withhold it momentarily.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator. I sincerely hope the Senator from Missouri will reconsider his objection to this bill.

I have been tremendously interested in this measure for some time. Representatives of the city of Chester have visited Washington, have contacted my office, and have laid all the facts before me with respect to the predicament in which the people of that city find themselves. The Senator from Nevada has stated the facts correctly. It was an act of God which caused the bridge to collapse in the first place; it was not the fault of the city of Chester.

The people of Chester entered into the contract in good faith, believing the city could probably spend the required amount of money to remove the remaining part of the wrecked bridge from the river, because the Army engineers removed only that part which had to be removed in order to permit navigation to continue. If they were going to remove any of it at all, it seems to me that at that particular time they should have removed all the wrecked structure. But they drove a pretty hard bargain with the people of Chester who were vitally interested in having a bridge across the river.

Whether or not the claim is allowed the city of Chester will never be able to carry out the contract, because of financial difficulty. The city can bond itself, as the Senator from Missouri well knows, for only so much money, but it can never carry out the agreement made because of that fact. I undertake to say that practically all cities throughout the country are bonded to the limit as the result of improvements and what not.

I hope the Senator from Missouri will let the bill go to the foot of the calendar in order that I may have a further talk with him regarding it, because it is really a justifiable claim. It will not cost the Government of the United States anything. Boats are plying the river at this time as a result of the removal of a certain part of the collapsed bridge from the river, and navigation is not being injured one iota by leaving the remaining part of the bridge where it is. It seems to me that the city ought to be relieved of its obligation as the result of what has been done, because it will hang over the heads of the people forever and the Government will never be able to collect anything from them.

If it were a city which had the necessary money, I should be the last to say that it should not fulfill the obligation into which it entered, but, under the circumstances, I hope that my distinguished friend from Missouri will have a little compassion and a wee bit of charity and tolerance with respect to the very unusual situation of the people of Chester. The city officials are very much worried about the whole situation. They have the obligation but they have no means, no way, in which to levy a tax to collect $130,000. The city of Chester, Ill., is a small city. It is bonded and taxed to the limit at the present time.

I hope my friend will reconsider and will permit the bill to go to the foot of the calendar so that we may see if we cannot work out something that will be satisfactory.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I appreciate the courtesy and the very great clarity of the Senator from Illinois, but it seems to me it would establish a highly unfortunate precedent to relieve the contracting party solely on the ground of financial difficulties in which it finds itself.

I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I want to serve notice at this time that I think there is so much merit in the bill, notwithstanding what my distinguished friend from Missouri says with respect to creating a precedent, that I shall, before Congress closes, move at the proper time to take it up and have a decision on it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

MICHELE BARTOLOMEO MARCHISIO

The bill (S. 841) for the relief of Michele Bartolomeo Marchisio was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws Michele Bartolomeo Marchisio, of Trinchera, Colo., who was admitted into the United States on a temporary visa, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of July 2, 1948, the date of his actual entry into the United States, upon the payment by him of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the first available immigration quota for nationals of Italy.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1260) for the relief of Stefanos Stefanou was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, this bill lacks certain information which I think should be obtained, and I ask that the bill be passed over until the next calendar call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

NICOLAE G. CARANFIL AND HIS FAMILY

The bill (S. 1304) for the relief of Nicolae G. Caranfil and his family was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws, Nicolae G. Caranfil, his wife Eufrosina, and their son, Andrei Georges, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted into the United States for permanent residence as of the date of their last entry into the United States upon payment of the required head taxes and visa fees.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct appropriate numbers from the nonpreference category of the proper immigration quota or quotas.

MRS. BARBARITA ROMERO

The bill (S. 1320) for the relief of Mrs. Barbarita Romero was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I think an explanation should go into the record regarding this bill.

This is a death claim. The claimant is the mother of a young woman who was killed in an automobile accident in Uruguay, where she was stationed as an employee of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs. At the time of the accident, she was riding in an official car used by the Institute, and being driven by the official chauffeur.

The Department of State has reported to the committee that in its judgment, on the basis of the facts, a court would be warranted in finding negligence on the part of the Government chauffeur, and entering judgment in this case.

However, a court action cannot be instituted under the Federal Tort Claims Act, because the accident took place outside the continental limits of the United States. The mother of the dead girl cannot receive anything under the Employees' Compensation Act, because she was not dependent for support upon her daughter. The Bureau of Employees' Compensation did allow $200 for funeral and burial expenses, and also paid the cost of preparing and transporting the remains to this country; a total cost of $1,131.

The amount provided for in the bill is $10,000.

The Department of Justice has registered opposition to the bill on the grounds that the claimant has received all of the benefits to which she was entitled under the Employees' Compensation Act for the death of her daughter. The committee did not concur in this view, since the right to compensation for wrongful death does not necessarily turn on the question of dependency, whereas compensation under the Employees' Compensation Act does require dependency in order to support an award.

The suggestion has been made that it would be preferable to grant jurisdiction to a United States district court to hear this claim, subject to the provisions of the Federal Tort Claims Act.

However, that would require bringing witnesses from Uruguay, and it does not appear that the expense and trouble to either the plaintiff or the Government, under such a procedure, is justified.

Senators will note, in the report of the Department of State, which is printed in the committee report, the recommendation that the word "the", the last word in line 10 on page 1, should be capitalized. The committee considered this to be a relatively inconsequential and entirely technical suggestion, and while there would certainly be no objection to such amendment, the committee did not feel that it was desirable, since the bill was not being amended in any other respect.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Reserving the right to object, I note that on May 3, last, the President of the United States, in the matter of House bill 1481, for the relief of the estate of Julius Caffareni, vetoed a claim of $2,559.05. On May 15, last, in reference to a claim of $7,500, the President of the United States vetoed that measure. Can the distinguished Senator from Nevada advise the Senate why the bill under discussion does not fall within the purview of those two bills which were vetoed by the President?

Mr. McCARRAN. I will say to the Senator that while we might anticipate that the policy committee of the minority may refer to similar bills, bills which are closely similar, though perhaps not directly in point, a veto of a similar bill is no direct indication of how the President will act with reference to this bill. For that reason, I think the bill should be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1320) for the relief of Mrs. Barbarita Romero was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mrs. Barbarita Romero, of Albuquerque, N. Mex., the sum of $10,000, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for compensation on account of the death of her daughter, the late Rosina Romero, who was fatally injured on September 12, 1947, in the performance of her duties as an employee of the Institute of Inter-American Affairs: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

PHIL MEYERS, ALSO KNOWN AS GIL MEYERS

The bill (S. 1779) for the relief of Phil Meyers, also known as Gil Meyers, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the immigration laws Phil Meyers, also known as Gil Meyers, of Denver, Colo., shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of his last entry into the United States, upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the first available immigration quota for nationals of Lithuania.

J. DON ALEXANDER—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1800) for the relief of J. Don Alexander was announced as next in order.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I think an explanatory statement on this bill should be made a part of the RECORD.

This is a case which was considered by a subcommittee headed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE]. Other members of the subcommittee were the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER]. The bill was at one time indefinitely postponed by action of the full committee, but at the request of the sponsor, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON], was reconsidered, and was before the subcommittee for more than 6 months. The subcommittee, after completing its deliberations, reported the bill favorably to the full committee, and the full committee accepted the subcommittee report.

The amount involved is $16,720, representing an alleged overpayment of income tax for the year 1929 covering capital net gain from the sale of stock.

What happened apparently was this: The corporation, of which this claimant was president and general manager, desired to issue additional capital stock; but no provision had been made in the charter of the corporation for such issuance. The time was favorable for selling stock, and in order to avoid the delay which would have been required in connection with amending the charter, Mr. Alexander furnished and sold his own stock, which sold at above par. The amount which he received in exchange for the stock was paid to the corporation, and the corporation carried this amount on its books as a debt to this claimant. However, since it had been actually his own stock which he sold, Mr. Alexander reported the profit as capital net gain and paid income tax on it.

Four years later, in a bankruptcy proceeding, it was judicially determined that Mr. Alexander had loaned his stock to the corporation for sale, and that he was to receive, not payment for the stock but a like number of shares of stock in the corporation. Since the corporation was in bankruptcy, no such stock could be issued. Therefore Mr. Alexander had neither his stock nor his money, though he had paid income tax to the United States on the stock sale in the amount of $16,720.

After reviewing all the evidence in the case, the subcommittee reached the conclusion that at least until April 12, 1933, there was no doubt in Mr. Alexander's mind that the stock which he had sold was his stock; that he had loaned the proceeds to the corporation; and that he was liable for the income-tax thereon, in accordance with the return which he had filed and the tax which he had paid. Therefore, he did not seek a tax refund, prior to the time the statute ran against him.

Under the circumstances, it was the view of the committee that this man should be entitled to a refund of the overpaid tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I do not like to prejudice this measure, but because of some matters which are involved in it I should like to ask that the measure go over until the next call of the calendar, with the assurance that certain matters which I have not had an opportunity to investigate, and as to which I have received certain information, will be cleared up.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Would the Senator include in his request that the measure go to the foot of the calendar, so that it may come up again when the calendar is called again?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. At the recalling of the calendar today?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. No; on the next call of the calendar.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have no objection.

Mr. McCARRAN. So that the bill may be called on the next call of the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent request is that when next the calendar is called this bill be included in the call. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REV. LAMBROS ECONOMAKOS

The bill (S. 1884) for the relief of Rev. Lambros Economakos was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is authorized and directed to discontinue any deportation proceedings and to cancel any outstanding order and warrant of deportation, warrant of arrest, and bond, which may have been issued in the case of Rev. Lambros Economakos (file 6570474), of New York, N. Y. From and after the date of enactment of this act, the said Rev. Lambros Economakos shall not again be subject to deportation by reason of the same facts upon which such deportation proceedings were commenced or any such warrants and order have issued.

SEC. 2. In the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws, the said Rev. Lambros Economakos shall be considered as having been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of July 29, 1948, the date of his last entry into the United States, upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the first available quota for nationals of Greece.

FREDERICK L. GOGGANS

The bill (S. 2095) for the relief of Frederick L. Goggans was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. This is a claim for injuries allegedly sustained as the result of an operation performed on the claimant while he was a member of the Armed Forces. The claimant asserts that the operation resulted in sterilization. No evidence has been submitted to indicate directly that this is not the case, although the Surgeon General of the United States has expressed the opinion that the ailment from which the claimant was suffering at the time of the operation could itself, and independently of the operation, have resulted in sterility, and has expressed the opinion that it was the ailment rather than the operation which had the result in question.

The operation was performed at a station hospital in England, and the records are not available to directly establish the facts. However, the claimant submitted statements from an examining physician at Johns Hopkins Hospital, to the effect that prior to his entering the service, while he suffered from prostatitis, he was not sterile; and giving the opinion of this physician that the sterility was definitely the result of the operation performed by the Army medical personnel. This is the only direct medical opinion on the point, the Surgeon General's opinion having been only hypothetical in nature.

The present state of the evidence clearly does not lend itself to a clean-cut determination of the issue; but the committee took the view that a preponderance of the evidence favored the claim, and on that basis, recommended that the bill be approved.

Ordinarily, in a case of this kind, the committee probably would have sent the bill to a court for determination; but in this case, it appears that the claimant never will be able to produce any more facts than those which were offered to the committee, and can therefore never establish beyond doubt that his version of the case is correct; and that on the other hand, the Department of the Army will be unable to produce any direct evidence in negation of the claim. For this reason, the committee thought it best to decide the case on the basis of the available record.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Was the committee satisfied that the medical record in England was not available?

Mr. McCARRAN. We tried to get the record, but we were unable to get it from England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2095) for the relief of Frederick L. Goggans was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frederick L. Goggans, of Orlando, Fla., the sum of $5,000, in full satisfaction of his claim against the United States for injuries sustained as a result of an operation performed on him on or about July 12, 1944, while he was a member of the Armed Forces and a patient in the Two Hundred and Fiftieth Station Hospital in the United Kingdom: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

CURT EDWARD FRIESE

The bill (S. 2403) for the relief of Curt Edward Friese was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. May we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is the case of a young man 34 years old, native and citizen of Germany. He was brought to the United States in 1948 for the purpose of appearing as a witness in certain treason cases; and is now employed as a language instructor at Carleton College, Northfield, Minn.

This appears to be a worthy case in all respects. The committee went to considerable length in an attempt to satisfy itself that this man is not a Nazi; and it was only after having become satisfied that he is not a Nazi that the committee approved the bill.

Attention is directed to the letter and documents submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. THYE] in connection with this case, which are printed in full in the committee report. The Senator from Minnesota himself stated, over his signature, "I am now more thoroughly convinced than I was when I offered S. 2403 of the complete integrity and the superior contributions which he can make to our American life as a permanent resident of the United States."

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, Dr. Friese is a member of the faculty of Carleton College, which is located at Northfield, Minn. I am also from Northfield, Minn. I am acquainted with Dr. Friese, and I am also very well acquainted with the president of Carleton College, Dr. Laurence M. Gould. In the report will be found a sworn statement by President Laurence M. Gould, wherein he vouches for Dr. Friese in a very high manner. Also in the report will be found a letter by Gen. Lucius D. Clay. General Clay became acquainted with Dr. Friese in Germany, and Dr. Friese acted as an interpreter for General Clay while General Clay was in Germany.

There are other statements in the record which vouch for Dr. Friese in this manner. The statements speak of Dr. Friese as a very respectable man and of high integrity. The persons who make the statements are confident that he will make a very fine citizen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 2403) for the relief of Curt Edward Friese, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for the third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, for the purposes of the immigration and naturalization laws, the alien, Curt Edward Friese, shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent resident, as of the date of his last entry into the United States, upon the payment of the visa fee and head tax. Upon the enactment of this act the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the appropriate quota the first year that such quota is available.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC RAILROAD CO.

The bill (S. 2991) for the relief of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co. was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., of Chicago, Ill., the sum of $836, in full settlement of all claims against the United States, as reimbursement for the expenses incurred by said company as a result of the injuries sustained by John A. Willis, a switchman of such company, on August 22, 1944, at the United States Army air base, Dalhart, Tex., when his feet were pulled off the stirrup of a railroad car by coal which had been left on the railroad track by employees of the Army: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

MERGER OF NATIONAL BANKING ASSOCIATIONS WITH STATE BANKS

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I desire to make a short statement with regard to Calendar No. 1115, House bill 1161, to provide for the conversion of national banking associations into and their merger or consolidation with State banks.

This bill has been objected to as reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency; but it is quite an important measure. I was going to ask unanimous consent to have the bill considered at this time, but, in view of the fact that many Senators who are deeply interested in it are absent, I shall not make the request. I desire, however, to make a statement concerning it for the RECORD.

I had a short conference earlier today with the distinguished majority leader, and he has agreed that before Congress recesses we will be able to bring up H. R. 1161, even if it is by special order. The distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is absent, his office informs me, and the distinguished junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is also absent. I want the RECORD to show that I am not now going to ask that we return to the bill on the calendar and consider it, because the majority leader has assured me that we will have ample opportunity to discuss it at the proper time.

WONG SUEY WING

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 382) for the relief of Wong Suey Wing, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, for the purposes of the immigration and naturalization laws, Wong Suey Wing, the minor child of Wong Sing, a citizen of the United States, shall be deemed to be eligible for admission into the United States under the provisions of sections 4 (a) and 9 of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended, if otherwise admissible under the immigration laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PASCH BROS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1208) for the relief of Pasch Bros., which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$2,009.86" and insert "$1,937.75", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Pasch Bros., of Milwaukee, Wis., the sum of $1,937.75, which sum was paid by Pasch Bros. to the Oshkosh Brewing Co., of Oshkosh, Wis., to reimburse such company for the value of internal revenue tax stamps which had been affixed to beer manufactured by such company and which was found to have been contaminated by a material supplied by Pasch Bros. and was destroyed under supervision of Government officers, the Internal Revenue Bureau having ruled that no refund of the value of such tax stamps can be made: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is a case involving a refund for internal-revenue tax stamps. The stamps in question were affixed to bottled beer, which was found to have been contaminated and was destroyed, after it had been removed from the bottling house and delivered to customers of the brewer. Revenue stamps were destroyed with the beer.

The claimant here is a Milwaukee jobber, who furnished the sirup used in the brewing of the contaminated beer. It has been established that the sirup was contaminated, and as a result the claimant here has had to make good to the brewer all his loss in connection with destruction of the beer. That loss included the amount of the revenue stamps destroyed, namely, $1,937.

Only a technicality stood between the brewer and a refund of the revenue stamps in this case. If the beer had not been removed from the bottlery or brewery before discovery of the contamination and subsequent destruction, the brewer could have secured a refund. Under the exact facts of the case, he could not get a refund. The loss has here been passed on to the claimant, who is properly liable for the loss sustained by the brewer, but who received no benefit whatever from the revenue stamps. The Government has taken no loss on the stamps, since they were destroyed with the beer. Under the circumstances, the committee felt the claim should be approved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES R. PROCTOR

The bill (S. 2016) for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Proctor was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Nevada if this is not a bill for the relief of Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Proctor, in the amount of $5,000, resulting from the death of their son from the actions of a mob in Mexico.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Is not this bill here by reason of the fact that the State Department of this Government refused to make a request upon the Government of Mexico for damages for the death of the individual involved in this measure?

Mr. McCARRAN. The State Department did not make a demand on the Government of Mexico. Whether or not that be the reason behind the bill's being here I am not able to say. They did not make a demand or a request.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Is not that usually done? Does not the State Department make requests ordinarily in such cases involving American citizens?

Mr. McCARRAN. I understand that other governments do, but ours does not follow that practice.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. From my checking of the measure, and from the checking by my staff, it seems to be a worthy bill, and I have no objection to its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, line 7, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$5,000", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to pay, out of any unobligated funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated for the foot-and-mouth-disease program, to Mr. and Mrs. Charles R. Proctor, of box 360, Nogales Star Route, Tucson, Ariz., the sum of $5,000 in full satisfaction of their claim against the United States for compensation for the death of their son, Robert L. Proctor, who was murdered on January 31, 1949, in Mexico by a mob of Mexican citizens while performing his duties as livestock inspector for the United States Department of Agriculture: Provided, That no part of the amount provided in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRANCISCO GONZALEZ PEREZ

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2077) for the relief of Francisco Gonzalez Perez, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of the eleventh category of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917, as amended (8 U. S. C. 136 (e)), or the provisions of the act of March 4, 1929, relating to entry after deportation (8 U. S. C. 180), insofar as concerns any act or acts of Francisco Gonzalez Perez of which the Department of State or the Department of Justice has notice at the time of enactment of this act, the said Francisco Gonzalez Perez may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence if he is not found to be otherwise inadmissible under the provisions of the immigration laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JULIANA SOSA DE SOLIS

The bill (S. 2264) for the relief of Juliana Sosa de Solis was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An explanation is requested. The Senator from Nevada is recognized.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, this is the case of a woman 27 years old, native and citizen of Mexico. Her husband is a United States citizen, and they have four children, the youngest of whom is a native-born citizen of the United States. This woman has never been convicted of any offense, but is excludable on the ground of having admitted commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, because on one occasion she signed a statement to the effect that, while present in the United States in 1938, she was apprehended while attempting to remove a dress from a department store in El Paso, Tex., without paying for it.

This woman's husband has been an employee of the Union Pacific Railroad since 1924, and the testimony is that he is a person of good moral character. Except for the technical point of having admitted an offense involving moral turpitude, this woman would be admissible. The purpose of this bill is to waive the exclusion provision. Incidentally, the value of the dress in question is alleged to have been $3.50.

The sponsor of the bill, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], has pointed out that if this woman had been convicted of the offense, she could have been pardoned and could thereafter have applied for suspension of deportation. Not having been convicted, she cannot apply for pardon, and her only recourse, if she is to be permitted to live with her husband and children, is enactment of special legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That, notwithstanding the provisions of the eleventh category of section 3 of the Immigration Act of 1917, as amended (8 U. S. C. 136 (e)), Juliana Sosa de Solis, the wife of a citizen of the United States, may be admitted to the United States for permanent residence if she is found otherwise admissible under the provisions of the immigration laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KUO CHIN LU

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2346) for the relief of Kuo Chin Lu, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in line 12, after the word "Chinese", to insert "racial", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in the administration of the immigration laws, Kuo Chin Lu, of Corvallis, Oreg., shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of March 3, 1945, the date of his last entry into the United States, upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the Chinese racial quota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DR. KUN KEN HU

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2608) for the relief of Dr. Kun Ken Hu, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment in line 12, after the word "Chinese", to insert "racial", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in the administration of the immigration and naturalization laws, Dr. Kun Ken Hu, of Augusta, Ga., shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted into the United States for permanent residence as of August 27, 1946, the date of his last entry into the United States, upon payment of the required head tax and visa fee.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of State is authorized and directed to instruct the proper quota-control officer to deduct one number from the nonpreference category of the first available Chinese racial immigration quota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for the third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MILDRED SMITH BUTLER—BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 1697) for the relief of Mildred Smith Butler was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada has no objection, I feel that, because of a precedent which would be established, I should like to have this bill go over, with the understanding that it may go to the foot of the calendar. I ask unanimous consent that that be done, so that the question of the precedent established may be adequately discussed.

Mr. McCARRAN. It may be understood that it will be on the next calendar, may it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is requested that the bill go over and be placed on the calendar and called at the next general call of the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LOUIS P. MURPHY, UNITED STATES IMMIGRANT INSPECTOR, EL PASO, TEX.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3506) for the relief of Louis P. Murphy, United States immigrant inspector, El Paso, Tex., which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, line 5, after the words "sum of", to strike out "$725.50" and insert "$225.50."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

PAUL D. BANNING, CHIEF DISBURSING OFFICER, TREASURY DEPARTMENT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6691) for the relief of Paul D. Banning, chief disbursing officer, Treasury Department, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 2, line 1, after the word "Department", to strike out "to the extent necessary to adjust overdrafts in their accounts as described in House Report No. 1609, Eighty-first Congress, second session," and insert "such credits being allowed to adjust certain overdrafts in such accounts", and on page 3, line 8, after the word "in", to strike out "their accounts as enumerated in House Report No. 1609, Eighty-first Congress, second session, in sums not to exceed those hereinafter stated" and insert "such accounts for sums not to exceed those hereinafter stated."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2196) to legalize maritime hiring halls, was announced as next in order.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object; owing to the highly controversial nature of the subject involved in the bill, as is indicated by the fact that in addition to the majority report, there are individual views separately expressed by three of the Members of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, I do not believe this is a bill which could be adequately considered on the consent calendar. Therefore, I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, with respect to Calendar No. 1833, which is Senate bill 3245, down to Calendar 1840, Senate bill 3687, not including Calendar No. 1836, which is Senate bill 2801, they are in this predicament——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inquire? Is his request inclusive of Calendar No. 1840?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes, Calendar Nos. 1833 to 1840, inclusive, with the single exception of Calendar No. 1836 are in this category. The reports have not been printed. I ask unanimous consent that the bills to which I have referred may go to the foot of the calendar and be included in the next call of the calendar.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, may I suggest that we simply stop calling the calendar now. Neither the bills nor the reports are in the red book from this point on. It seems to me that we have reached a point where I shall be compelled to object to all the remaining bills on the calendar. I suggest that the call of the calendar cease at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from Colorado has not been put. A unanimous-consent request is made by the Senator from Colorado that Calendar Nos. 1833 to 1840, inclusive, excluding, however, Calendar No. 1836, be carried over, placed on the calendar, and called the next time there is a general call of the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bills passed over en bloc are as follows:

S. 3245, to give effect to the medical examination (seafarers) convention, 1946, adopted at the twenty-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946.

S. 2484, to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to provide war risk and certain marine and liability insurance.

S. 2786, to amend the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, to further promote the development and maintenance of the American merchant marine, and for other purposes.

S. 3109, to aid the development and maintenance of American-flag shipping on the Great Lakes, and for other purposes.

S. 3244, to give effect to the certification of ships' cooks convention, 1946, adopted at the twenty-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization, held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946.

S. 3246, to give effect to the food and catering (ships' crews) convention, 1946, adopted at the twenty-eighth (maritime) session of the International Labor Organization, held at Seattle, Wash., June 6–29, 1946.

S. 3687, to require the armed services to utilize private American shipping services for the overseas transportation of commodities and civilian personnel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the next calendar number, 1836.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Is the present occupant of the chair asking that Calendar 1836 be called?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that to be the next on the calendar.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I have objection to make to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the next item on the calendar. Objection is heard.

Mr. TAFT. I object, because neither the bill nor the report are contained in my red calendar book.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard to Calendar No. 1836, Senate bill 2801.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, may I ask that the objection be withheld for a few minutes until I have a chance to make an explanation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio withhold his objection?

Mr. TAFT. Yes. May I ask one other question about the bill. Is not this a bill to ratify a convention?

Mr. GREEN. The convention has been ratified. It is a convention between 10 nations, of which the United States is one. The bill would implement the convention, to carry out our obligations within it. There have been hearings held both in the Senate committee and House committee, and the bill has the unanimous approval, as I understand, of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is important that the convention should be put into effect in order to show the good faith of this Nation, which originated the plan.

Mr. TAFT. I do not know that I shall object to the bill, but the bill is not in the red calendar book, neither is the report. Therefore, I object to its present consideration.

Mr. GREEN. The report is here. The bill is before the Senate with the amendments printed in it. The report itself has been printed. I do not know what more could be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the clerk state the bill for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2801) to give effect to the International Convention for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries, signed at Washington under date of February 8, 1949, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The clerk will state the next order on the calendar.

JURISDICTION OF NEW YORK STATE COURTS OVER CERTAIN CIVIL ACTIONS BETWEEN INDIANS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 192) to confer jurisdiction on the courts of the State of New York with respect to civil actions between Indians as to which Indians are parties, which had been reported from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 3, after the word "preserve", to strike out "and"; in line 4, after the word "on", to strike out "approval by" and insert "certification to"; in line 5, after the word "Interior", to strike out "and on publication" and insert "by the governing body of such tribe shall be published"; in line 6, after the word "and" to strike out "publication by the secretary of the State of New York upon certification by the Secretary of the Interior", and insert "thereafter"; after line 10, to strike out "issue. Any such tribe may at any time amend or modify its declaration of tribal customs and laws and such amendments or modifications shall become operative and effective when the procedure outlined herein shall have been carried out" and insert "issue: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require any such tribe or the members thereof to obtain fish and game licenses from the State of New York for the exercise of any hunting and fishing rights provided for such Indians under any agreement, treaty, or custom", and on page 3, after line 10, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 2 years after the date of its passage.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the courts of the State of New York under the laws of such State shall have jurisdiction in civil actions and proceedings between Indians or between one or more Indians and any other person or persons to the same extent as the courts of the State shall have jurisdiction in other civil actions and proceedings, as now or hereafter defined by the laws of such State: Provided, That the governing body of any recognized tribe of Indians in the State of New York shall have the right to declare, by appropriate enactment within one year from the date of this act, those tribal laws and customs which they desire to preserve, which, on certification to the Secretary of the Interior by the governing body of such tribe shall be published in the Federal Register and thereafter shall govern in all civil cases involving reservation Indians when the subject mater of such tribal laws and customs is involved or at issue: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to require any such tribe or the members thereof to obtain fish and game licenses from the State of New York for the exercise of any hunting and fishing rights provided for such Indians under any agreement, treaty, or custom: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as subjecting the lands within any Indian reservation in the State of New York to taxation for State or local purposes, nor as subjecting any such lands, or any Federal or State annuity in favor of Indians or Indian tribes, to execution on any judgment rendered in the State courts, except in the enforcement of a judgment in a suit by one tribal member against another in the matter of the use or possession of land: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the alienation from any Indian nation, tribe, or band of Indians of any lands within any Indian reservation in the State of New York.

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect 2 years after the date of its passage.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, at this point the Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD a statement which he has prepared, and also the text of a report by the New York State Joint Legislative Committee on Indian Affairs, which deal with the subject of the bill which was just passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from New York is granted, and the matter referred to will be inserted in the RECORD. The Senator from New York is commended for saving time in that manner.

The statement by Mr. IVES and the report referred to are as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR IVES

Passage of S. 192 would make those Indians who live in New York State subject to the civil jurisdiction of the courts of that State. This move follows, in logical sequence, from the actions of the last Congress in making State criminal laws enforceable against Indians.

The present uncertainties of existing Indian legal status seriously handicap the Indian in the conduct of his daily affairs. A majority of Indians in New York State seek employment outside the boundaries of their reservations. In so doing, they are hindered by any employer's all too understandable reluctance to hire anyone against whom he may have no legal recourse. Contracts entered into by Indians are not enforceable in the State courts. There is considerable doubt as to whether or not Indians can be sued for tort actions. And with the labor market's postwar return to a more normal state of balance, this restriction on an Indian's job-seeking ability will become of increasing significance.

Furthermore, tribal laws and custom fail completely to provide a stable foundation on which the fundamental institutions of family and property can be based. Domestic relations show the worst effects of lack of socially desirable standards of conduct. Marriages are terminable by any Indian male at will; no regard is evidenced by tribal custom for the hapless plight of the deserted Indian wife. Problems of inheritance of property, in the absence of any formalized and orderly procedure, often are solved by the traditional 10-day feast distribution. Under this means of disposition, the immediate family of the deceased is frequently left penniless, while distant clan brothers receive his property.

The provisions of this proposal, now before the Senate, are similar to those of S. 1687, passed by the Senate 2 years ago. Passage of S. 192 now would allow tribal law to remain in those areas where it serves as an adequate guide for human conduct. Provision has been made for the judicial application of tribal custom where the Indians so desire. The gradual assimilation of this historic culture into the pattern of the modern American scene is the goal sought.

This bill is a continuation of the process of orderly development of Indian affairs, and it represents a further constructive step in the direction of assumption by the Indian of the full responsibilities of citizenship.

REPORT BY JOINT LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

To the Legislature of the State of New York:

On June 25, 1949, at a joint hearing in Washington, committees of both Houses of Congress resumed consideration of identical bills introduced in the Senate and House of Representatives which seek to remove the prolonged uncertainty concerning civil jurisdiction of New York courts over reservation Indians. Also taken up at that time were bills to permit payment of Indian rentals by the city of Salamanca, which stands almost entirely upon reservation land, to the treasurer of the Seneca Nation, and to authorize the latter to grant 10-year leases of other reservation land not included in earlier permission from the Federal Government. Both sets of bills are now before the respective Houses of Congress awaiting further action.

CIVIL JURISDICTION

The civil jurisdiction bills (S. 192 and H. R. 5135) follow the form first suggested in this committee's 1945 report and submitted to representatives of all New York Indian groups in January of that year. The proposed recognition of State civil jurisdiction, which would round out the approval of criminal jurisdiction effected in 1948 by Public Law 881, Eightieth Congress, expressly forbids interpretation in a manner to destroy reservations by taxation, sale, or otherwise. The bills also embody machinery whereby tribal laws and customs may be perpetuated and made to govern in all civil cases involving reservation Indians when the subject matter of such laws or customs is involved or at issue.

The future of New York Indians is bound to be greatly influenced by the fate of these bills. Enactment would end their long isolation and inevitably work toward complete assimilation with the main body of citizens. By approving the bills and discontinuing its New York Agency, the Federal Indian Bureau has indicated clearly a belief that the Indians are prepared for this step.

The economic dependence of Indians upon the State has been discussed in previous reports of this committee. Apart from the State's contributions for education, welfare, and highways, it has been shown that practically all Indian employment is outside reservations and that almost no commerce or industry exists in these areas. Since 1942, however, reservation Indians have been clothed with a degree of immunity from State law by reason of the decision in United States v. Forness (125 Fed. 2d 928, cert, den. 316 U. S. 694), which applied the principle first declared in Worcester v. Georgia (6 Pet. 515 (1832)), holding that State laws do not apply to reservation Indians except insofar as the Federal Government has given its consent.

Although intended for their protection, the Fornes case rule has proven a severe handicap to Indians in securing desirable employment and ordinary business credit. It also has jeopardized the functioning of State courts in matters involving Indians. Whether an Indian can be sued in the New York supreme court for personal injuries suffered in a State highway automobile accident is to be determined in an action now pending. Because the plaintiff is also Indian, a denial of jurisdiction could leave the latter without legal remedy. On the other hand, the Appellate Division, Fourth Department recently upheld the jurisdiction of the court in an action between two members of the Tuscarora Tribe, involving title to land within that reservation, on the special ground that no Peacemakers Court was available. Mr. Pleasant v. Patterson (276 app. div. 819, mem. Earlier), in United States v. National Gypsum Co. (114 Fed. 2d 859 (1944)), the same court which decided the Forness case refused to cancel leases of gypsum deposits on the Tonawanda Reservation made under authority of section 85 of the New York Indian law. However, this holding was based upon the peculiar history of this reservation and cannot be regarded as a general qualification of the Forness decision. Until Congress sees fit to more clearly define the limits of State jurisdiction, the latter case will continue to generate confusion.

In spite of the length of time the problem has been under discussion, there still is too little understanding of the primitive conditions on reservations which have so long arrested Indian advancement. Except in respect to nationality, inheritance, and land ownership, New York Indians are conspicuously lacking in rules or customs to regulate ordinary civil relationships. Yet even in these three categories, existing governments are incapable of compelling respect for these traditions without assistance from State courts.

Domestic relations show the worst effects of lack of civilized standards of conduct. In accordance with ancient and respected custom, an Indian can rid himself of the obligations of marriage at will, regardless of justification or the wishes of his mate. No tribal rule can be invoked to compel support of his offspring. Because of the much stricter bonds of marriages contracted under State law, it is becoming common to avoid a civil ceremony to the end that either party may freely withdraw from the union if circumstances make this desired.

Problems of inheritance are among the many that result from lack of well-settled custom. Although a majority of Indians now recognize some form of lineal descent in cases of intestacy, this rule is not sufficiently established to prevent frequent conflicts over the division of Indian estates. Among those groups which adhere most strictly to ancient tradition the Tenth Day Feast distribution is observed. In accordance with this custom members of the clan (each tribe having been composed of eight clans originally) of a deceased person assemble on the tenth day following his death and then parcel out his belongings among themselves, sometimes to the exclusion of children. Two instances where the courts have upset such unjust divisions are to be found in Hatch v. Luckman (64 Misc. 508, off'd 155 App. Div. 765) and United States v. Hattie Charles (U. S. Cir. Ct., 2d Cir.) (unreported but see lower court opinions in People ex rel. Charles v. Blackchief (8 F. Supp. 295); United States v. Charles (1 F. R. D. 121 and United States v. Charles (23 F. Supp. 346). In the Hattie Charles litigation the Federal Government unsuccessfully sought to enforce a Death Feast distribution against one claiming by heirship.

Apart from lack of standards for ordinary conduct, a common weakness in the governments of all reservations is the want of means to enforce even recognized customs. Only two reservations have their own courts which means that the inhabitants of four other reservations are entirely dependent upon State courts in all civil litigation. Furthermore, even the peacemaker's courts on the two Seneca reservations are powerless to execute their own judgments because they have nothing with which to do so. In the past, therefore, unless a defeated party submitted to the decision, the only recourse of a successful litigant in these courts was to sue in the State courts on his judgment as permitted by section 52 of the New York Indian law. But since the Forness decision the existence of this means of enforcement has become uncertain. It also has cast doubt upon the right of Indians to avail themselves of section 5 of the same State law which provides:

"Any demand or right of action, jurisdiction of which is not conferred upon a peacemaker's court, may be prosecuted and enforced in any court of the State, the same as if all the parties thereto were citizens."

Consequently, to a very considerable degree, New York Indians are laws unto themselves. That such comparative freedom from restraint has not made Indians lawless and irresponsible people still does not compensate for the underlying lack of security or stability in reservation existence. Neither does it overcome the handicap in business and social relationships with non-Indians that the Forness decision immunity has boomeranged upon them.

The only significant changes to be expected from passage of the bills would be the positive ones of extending orderly processes of government to the reservations and of ending the power of individual Indians to avoid ordinary civil responsibilities. Passage of the bills would not effect any change in basic Indian traditions or customs unless these people, by means provided in the law, see fit to modify them. Enactment would, in fact, strengthen enforcement of such rules as do exist by banishing uncertainty as to the powers of State courts. Neither would the proposed law permit taxation or alienation of reservation land, although many Indians have been led to believe that these are the very ends the bills aim to accomplish.

Specific exclusion of the powers of taxation and disturbance of titles makes it clear that adoption of the bills would not end all Federal guardianship, yet such is within the constitutional power of the central government (United States v. Osage County (251 U. S. 128, 64 L. ed. 184, 46 S. Ct. 100); Re Heff (197 U. S. 488, 49 L. ed. 848, 25 S. Ct.)). Furthermore, if active guardianship were to cease, the United States would retain authority to prosecute in Federal courts claims of Indian tribes against the State (United States v. Minnesota (270 U. S. 181, 70 L. ed. 539, 46 S. Ct. 298)). This case also determines that State statutes of limitations "neither bind nor have any application to the United States when suing to enforce a public right or to protect interests of its Indian wards."

How much longer New York Indians will be condemned to the stagnating and stifling effects of segregation depends upon how soon Congress will recognize the futility of treating them as independent, self-governing units which they have long since ceased to be. The argument most often used against application of State civil laws is that it would violate the 1794 Treaty of Canandaigua, in which the United States acknowledged the reservations and agreed that it would not claim or disturb them or the Six Nations or their friends residing there "in the free use and enjoyment thereof." Congress itself has sufficiently discredited such claims by enacting laws forbidding the commission of crimes (23 Stat. 362), declaring Indians citizens (43 Stat. 253), enforcing local sanitation and quarantine regulations and compelling school attendance (45 Stat. 1185), to mention but a few. As was held in Roff v. Burney (168 U. S. 218, 42 S. Ct. 442):

"Congress may pass such laws as it sees fit prescribing the rules governing the intercourse of Indians with one another and with citizens of the United States, and also the courts in which all controversies to which an Indian may be a party shall be submitted."

Unless it is the destiny of New York Indians to be preserved as museum pieces of an ancient but completely outmoded civilization, it seems time that realism replace mere sentiment in governmental policy toward them.

SALAMANCA RENT LEGISLATION

Salamanca derives its name from a Spanish financier who was one of the promoters of the Atlantic & Great Western Railway, which, upon completion in 1861, extended from Salamanca to Cleveland. The change from the former name of Bucktooth was made in 1862. Besides providing valuable rail connection with the West, that with New York and the East having been effected by the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad in 1851, the different gages of the two roads established Salamanca temporarily as an important transfer point.

Lumbering was the earliest industry and flourished until exhaustion of the abundant original pine forests. Later came tanneries, railroad shops, and furniture factories, but with the passage of time, activities in all three have greatly declined, without a sufficient number of newer and more diversified industries taking their place. Consequently, Salamanca, like many other communities, is now anxiously seeking new industrial enterprises for its thinning population. But in this search the community labors under the almost insurmountable handicap of a unique system of land leasing which discourages investment by outsiders.

Before 1875 all leases of that portion of the city lying within the Allegany Reservation of Seneca Indians had run from individual Indians to white settlers. This led to great disparity in the amount of rentals and laxity in their collection. In 1875, Congress returned the leasing power to the Seneca Nation itself and authorized the granting of terms not exceeding 12 years with a provision automatically extending existing leases for a period of 5 years after passage of the law. All rentals were made payable to the treasurer of the nation (act of February 19, 1875, ch. 90, 18 Stat. 330). Five years later a disastrous fire swept through the business section of the city, then consisting entirely of frame buildings, and demonstrated the need for more permanent and fire-resisting construction. The task of securing needed capital for such extensive rehabilitation presented serious difficulties because savings banks, insurance companies, and other lending institutions have always regarded Salamanca titles as not sufficiently permanent, and local bankers and businessmen did not feel warranted in risking such heavy investment on the security of leases having only 7 years to run. Relief finally came by a further act of Congress amending the earlier law to allow leases for terms up to 99 years (act of September 30, 1890, ch. 1132, 26 Stat. 558). But since the new law was permissive only, and the leaders of the Seneca Nation were at first reluctant to grant leases for longer than 25 years, prolonged negotiations between the committees representing lessor and lessees were necessary before agreement was reached on leases for the full term permitted. Consent was eventually obtained by increasing the total annual rent to $6,000 which approximately doubled the previous sum. On this new basis leases for 99 years for the entire area situated on the reservation were consummated in 1892.

A further change occurred 9 years later when, because of dissatisfaction among Indians over the handling of rentals by officers of the nation, Congress made these payable to the United States Indian agent who was thereby directed to pay the Indian treasurer $2,500 per year for disposal by the Seneca council, and to disburse the balance "among the heads of families of the Seneca Nation" (act of February 28, 1901, ch. 622, 31 Stat. 819).

Approximately three-fourths of the existing leases were made under authority of the 1890 law. The present confusion results from failure to maintain maps showing boundaries of these leases and systematic records of original leases, as well as assignments, transfers by death and subleases. Since the right to continued occupancy of each fraction of land comprised within an original lease is dependent upon payment of the agreed rental for the entire tract, each owner of a fractionated interest cannot protect himself merely by paying his proportionate part of the total rent. Also, because of the lack of up-to-date maps, it is frequently difficult to determine which main lease controls a given piece of property. Adding to the confusion is the omission to provide means for recording leases, assignments, or subleases so that such information may be readily had by the public.

Because of the many uncertainties and risks inherent in this kind of land tenure, real-estate mortgages have never been acceptable security to other than local lending institutions and business firms have been reluctant to locate in Salamanca.

As a means of overcoming handicaps to community growth and prosperity, this legislature enacted chapter 231, laws of 1942, authorizing the city of Salamanca to impose a tax equal to the total annual rentals for that part of the municipality located on the reservation. Before the law could be put into operation the court of appeals, in an action intended to test its constitutionality, dismissed the proceeding because of nonjoinder of the Seneca Nation (Wood v. City of Salamanca (289 N. Y. 279)). Under strict application of the reasoning in the Forness case, this became an impossibility when a Federal District Court, upon motion of the United States Attorney, ruled that the Seneca Nation could not be sued by the city (Salamanca v. Seneca Nation of Indians (47 Fed. Supp. 939 (1942)).

During the 7 years following, Federal policy underwent a complete reversal. Coincident with an announcement of intention to close its New York Indian agency, early in 1949 the Indian Bureau proposed that the 1942 State law be revived and that Congress permit payment of rentals to the Seneca Nation treasurer without intervention by the Federal agent.

The new proposal was promptly endorsed by a special lease committee of the Seneca Nation Council, then by the Common Council of the city. Thereafter, at the latter's request this legislature amended the 1942 law in certain respects necessary to conform to the new plan (ch. 787, Laws of 1949), and with the recommendation of the Department of Interior, bills were introduced in both Houses of Congress to authorize payment of lease rentals by the city of Salamanca to the Seneca Nation treasurer. Both of the latter bills require bonding of such officer for faithful performance of his duties (S. 1947 and H. R. 4942, 81st Cong., 1st ses.).

Seldom has any single piece of legislation promised more constructive results than do these identical measures. The Seneca Nation would be assured of regular receipt of rentals and residents of Salamanca for the first time would enjoy freedom from the hazards of leasing which in turn would permit competition with other communities for new industries on fairly even terms. In one stroke the principal source of friction between Indians and non-Indians would disappear and in the brightened future of the city it is not too much to expect that differences of race would be much sooner forgotten.

This committee is proud of its part in helping to awaken interest among Members of Congress and many others in long neglected problems of New York Indians. Already this movement has produced the 1948 law confirming State criminal jurisdiction (Public Law 881, 80th Cong.) which gives inhabitants of Indian reservations their first effective criminal law enforcement, and has proven universally satisfactory. During the present session of Congress, with continued cooperation between the administrative and legislative departments, passage of the major remaining items, the civil jurisdiction and Salamanca rent bills, may be hoped for.

Respectfully submitted.

RENEWAL OF CONTRACTS FOR CARRYING MAIL ON STAR ROUTES

The bill (H. R. 8270) relating to the renewal of contracts for the carrying of mail on star routes was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An explanation is desired.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, this bill relates to the renewal of contracts for the transportation of mail. Under the existing practice the Postmaster General enters into contracts for the carrying of mail, and he may, upon expiration of the contracts, renew them without competitive bidding. It frequently happens, however, that the prime contractor may transfer the contract to a subcontractor, who, with the approval of the Postmaster General carries out the contract. But the Postmaster General has not the power to renew the contract with the subcontractor without competitive bidding. Under this bill he would be permitted to do so.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 8270) relating to the renewal of contracts for the carrying of mail on star routes was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3682) to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, with respect to the time of taking effect of annuities of Members and elected officers of the Senate and House of Representatives was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I called for a report on this bill, and was advised there was no report. However, I have just been handed one. I should like to have the bill go over until I can read the report and understand the provisions of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, may I ask that the bill go to the foot of the calendar and be considered at the next call of the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the bill be carried over to the next general call of the calendar and be called at that time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill (H. R. 7265) to provide for the conduct of a periodic census of governments was announced as next in order.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I make a similar request with respect to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As to House bill 7265 the Senator from Rhode Island requests unanimous consent that it go over until the next call of the calendar and be included in the next general call of the calendar? Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate revert to Senate bill 3682, Calendar 1843, to which I interposed objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada that the Senate revert to Senate bill 3682?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I shall object to it, because I have neither the report nor the bill in my calendar book. I do not know what change is proposed to be made in our pension systems. It seems to me we should at least have a report on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. THYE subsequently said: Mr. President, objection previously was made to the consideration of Senate bill 3682, Calendar 1843, a bill to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended, with respect to the time of taking effect of annuities of Members and elected officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

I was present at the hearings of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service when this measure was under consideration there. The bill seems to be a very simple one. Unless it is enacted, those who may be discharged would lose a month's pay. I believe the bill should be enacted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator submit a motion in regard to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. I have already objected to consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been heard.

BILL PASSED OVER AND PLACED AT FOOT OF THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 4390) to authorize the conveyance for school purposes of certain land in Acadia National Park to the town of Tremont, Maine, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I think I am correct in my understanding that the next three bills on the calendar do not have reports acompanying them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the reports are here.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Illinois refer to House bill 4390, Calendar No. 1845, or to Senate bill 2658, Calendar No. 1846?

Mr. LUCAS. I am referring to the next three bills on the calendar.

Mr. CHAPMAN. The report is here on Calendar No. 1846, Senate bill 2658.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of House bill 4390, Calendar No. 1845?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Upon objection by the Senator from Kansas, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, may I make the same request as the one which has previously been made in respect to other bills, namely, that the bill be placed at the foot of the calendar, to be called at the next call of the calendar?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator fron. Nebraska that the bill be placed at the foot of the calendar, to be called at the next call of the calendar? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

REARING PONDS AND FISH HATCHERY IN KENTUCKY

The bill (S. 2658) to establish rearing ponds and a fish hatchery in the State of Kentucky was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to construct, equip, maintain, and operate rearing ponds and a fish hatchery at a suitable location in Kentucky.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated from time to time, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, including not to exceed $275,000 for the acquisition of lands and water rights or interests therein and the construction and equipment of such station.

TRANSPORTATION ON CANADIAN VESSELS BETWEEN POINTS IN ALASKA OR CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

The bill (S. 3771) to provide transportation on Canadian vessels between Skagway, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, between Haines, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, and between Hyder, Alaska, and other points in Alaska or the continental United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, until June 30, 1951, notwithstanding the provisions of law of the United States restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise direcly or indirectly from any port in the United States to another port of the United States, passengers may be transported on Canadian vessels between Skagway, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, between Haines, Alaska, and other points in Alaska, and between Hyder, Alaska, and other points in Alaska or the continental United States, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation: Provided, That such Canadian vessels may transport merchandise between Hyder, Alaska, and other ports and points herein enumerated.

PRODUCTION OF ABACÁ BY THE UNITED STATES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, Senate bill 3520, Calendar 1689, was ordered placed at the foot of the calendar, to be called at this time. That bill will now be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 3520) to strengthen the common defense by providing for continuation and expansion of Western Hemisphere production of abacá by the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Armed Services with amendments, on page 2, line 6, after the word "production", to insert "throughout the world"; and in line 14, after the word "continued", to insert "by the United States Government", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Abacá Production Act of 1950."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. Whereas abacá, a hard fiber used in the making of marine and other cordage, is a highly strategic and critical material which cannot be produced in commercial quantities in the continental United States, and of which an adequate supply is vital to the industrial and military requirements for the common defense of the United States; therefore, it has been the policy of the United States to continue the program for production and sale of abacá in which it was engaged at the termination of hostilities of World War II, and it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to encourage abacá production throughout the world, and in that connection to further the development and maintenance of abacá production in the Western Hemisphere through aid and supplementation of operations under the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (60 Stat. 596) and the national security and common defense.

PROGRAM

SEC. 3. (a) Production of abacá in the Western Hemisphere shall be continued by the United States Government: Provided, That the total acreage under cultivation shall not exceed the aggregate under cultivation as of the close of the month next preceding the date upon which this act shall become effective, except that additional acreage may be added in the Western Hemisphere at the direction of the President and reduction of acreage under cultivation to abacá under this act shall be effected whenever the President shall so direct: And provided further, That in no event shall the total number of acres under cultivation to abacá under this act at any one time exceed fifty thousand.

(b) Such surveys and research may be undertaken as are necessary or desirable to obtain the best available land in the Western Hemisphere for the production of abacá, the best development of abacá and development and maintenance of the plantations for the production of abacá established on such land, and the most economical and practical processing and disposition of such fiber and by-products as result from the production of abacá on such land.

(c) Abacá fiber, produced under this act, which from time to time is not needed for stockpiling under the Strategic and Critical Materials Stock Piling Act (60 Stat. 596), as amended, may be sold otherwise than for stockpiling under such act.

ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 4. (a) The President may issue such rules and regulations and make such determinations as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the provisions of this act.

(b) All contracts entered into and all acquisitions of property effected under this act shall be in such manner and on such terms and conditions as the President shall determine.

(c) The President may exercise any or all of the powers, authority, and discretion conferred upon him by this act through such departments, agencies, officers, Government corporations, or instrumentalities of the United States, whether or not existing at the date of the enactment of this act, as he may direct.

(d) The President may transfer to the departments, agencies, officers, Government corporations, or instrumentalities of the United States, or to any of them, which he directs to exercise the powers, authority, and discretion conferred upon him by this act, such facilities, personnel, property, and records relating to such powers, authority, and discretion, as he deems necessary; and he may so transfer all appropriations or other funds available for carrying out such powers, authority, and discretion.

(e) The financial transactions authorized by this act shall be subject to the Government Corporation Control Act, as amended, and other laws specifically applicable to wholly owned Government corporations as a class.

FINANCING

SEC. 5. (a) For the purpose of carrying out the functions authorized by this act, there is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund which shall consist of (1) such amounts as the Congress may appropriate thereto, which appropriations are hereby authorized, (2) such amounts as may be paid into the fund pursuant to subsection (e) of this section, and (3) amounts received in connection with any transfer pursuant to subsection 4 (d) of this act.

(b) Pursuant to regulations prescribe by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make advances from the fund not to exceed a total of $35,000,000 outstanding at any one time. There shall be added to such advances and treated as advances an amount equal to the net value of assets of the program for the production and sale of abacá as held by the Reconstruction Finance Corportation on the effective date of this act.

(c) Interest shall be paid on each outstanding advance at such rates as may be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be appropriate in view of the terms for which such advances are made.

(d) Appropriations are hereby authorized for payment in the form of a grant, in such amounts as may be estimated in the annual budget as necessary to cover losses. The annual budget program shall specifically set forth any losses sustained in excess of the grant previously made for the last completed fiscal year. Appropriations are hereby authorized for payment to cover such additional losses incurred.

(e) Receipts for each fiscal year may be used for payment of the costs incurred in connection with projects and activities authorized by this act. After providing out of such receipts for necessary working capital requirements, any amounts in excess thereof shall be paid annually into the fund. Such payment shall be applied to reduce the amount of advances outstanding, and any remaining payments shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(f) Until such time as the appropriations herein authorized are made, such of the powers, authority, and discretion provided for in this act as the President may delegate to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may be exercised by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the authority conferred by former section 5d (3) of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (54 Stat. 573, 961; 55 Stat. 249); joint resolution approved June 30, 1945 (59 Stat. 310); and section 12 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended (61 Stat. 207), with funds recovered or recoverable from its national defense, war, and reconversion activities.

DISPOSAL OF PROPERTY

SEC. 6. Whenever the President shall determine that any property is excess to the purposes of this act, or that adequate supplies of abacá will be available from other sources within the Western Hemisphere on a basis acceptable to the United States, property held for the purposes of this act may be disposed of in such manner and on such terms and conditions as the President may prescribe.

REPORTS

SEC. 7. Within 6 months after the close of each fiscal year a report shall be submitted to the Congress on the activities under this act.

EFFECTIVE DATE AND DURATION

SEC. 8. This act shall become effective on April 1, 1950, and shall remain effective for 10 years thereafter, unless the President shall direct earlier termination of operations, and for such further period as is necessary to the earliest practicable liquidation of operations under this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MINERAL RESOURCES WITHIN SUPERIOR NATIONAL FOREST, MINN.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, at the last call of the calendar objection was made to the consideration of House bill 4895, Calendar 1782, a bill relating to utilization of the mineral resources within the Superior National Forest. The objection which was made to the consideration of the bill at that time was because no report accompanied the bill; for that reason, several Senators felt obliged to object.

I understand that there is no objection to the bill itself. It is set forth by title on page 15 of the calendar, being House bill 4895. I desire to have the bill considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title, for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (H. R. 4895) to permit the prospecting, development, mining, removal, and utilization of the mineral resources within the Superior National Forest, Minn., and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, may we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, the explanation is perhaps best stated in the report itself:

The purpose of this bill is to permit the development of mineral resources in the national forests in Minnesota. No expenditure of Federal funds is required.

Ordinarily, lands withdrawn from the public domain for national-forest purposes are subject to the operation of the general mining laws if those laws are applicable in the State where the public-domain lands are located. However, in the case of Minnesota, as well as Michigan and Wisconsin, the public-domain lands were excluded from the application of the general mining laws by the act of February 18, 1873 (Rev. Stat. 2345, 17 Stat. 465, 30 U. S. C. A. 48).

This bill provides permission for the letting of contracts respecting the national forest in regard to granite quarries and mines. Some such contracts are now in existence, but additional contracts cannot be let unless this measure is enacted.

I think the bill is a very simple piece of proposed legislation. Its enactment will permit the quarrying of granite rock which is to be found in the areas of that national forest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 7, after the words "of the", to strike out "Superior National Forest," and insert "national forests in"; and on page 2, in line 9, after the word "Agriculture", to strike out the comma and "and the development and utilization thereof shall be subject to such conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe to insure the adequate utilization and proper protection of the lands for national forest purposes."

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to permit the prospecting, development, mining, removal, and utilization of the mineral resources within the national forests in Minnesota, and for other purposes."

AMENDMENT OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT OF MAY 29, 1930, AS AMENDED

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate revert in the calendar to the consideration of Senate bill 2640, Calendar 1567.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. For the information of the Senate let the clerk state the bill by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 2640) to amend the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. TAFT. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

That completes the call of the calendar.

By unanimous consent entered into yesterday, the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] has the floor upon the completion of the call of the calendar. Therefore the Senator from Washington is recognized.

BUILDING FOR FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I wish to say there is now before the Public Works Committee a bill authorizing the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to acquire or construct with its own funds a building in the District of Columbia suitable for the Corporation. It was hoped that the bill could be considered today. However, after talking with the distinguished Senator from Florida, he tells me that he has reported the bill favorably from the subcommittee, and he hopes to be able to get it before the full committee on Monday. I hope that may be done, so that at the time of the next call of the calendar, that bill can be considered and acted upon by the Senate.

ANNOUNCEMENT REGARDING CONSIDERATION OF BILL EXTENDING THE SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to make what I believe to be a very important announcement with respect to what may happen in the Senate on Monday next, so far as the program is concerned:

In the event that there is no debate on that day on House bill 6000, I shall ask that the Senate temporarily lay aside that measure, and take up House bill 6826, Calendar No. 1789, a bill to provide for the common defense through the registration and classification of certain male persons, and for other purposes.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The Senator from Illinois does not expect to have the Senate vote on that measure at that time; does he?

Mr. LUCAS. Not at all; the Senator from Ohio is correct.

Mr. President, the Selective Service Act now on the statute books expires on the twenty-fourth of this month. I have been advised by the military officials that unless the bill extending that act is passed and sent to the President of the United States, for his approval, before the twenty-fourth, every boy who has registered during the last 2 years will have to reregister. So I make this statement because of the tremendous importance of the matter. It involves a deadline, in respect to which we cannot retroactively effectuate the purpose of the bill without going to a great deal of trouble. I hope we can debate the bill on Monday and that we will pass it as quickly as possible.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Washington has the floor. I shall be glad to answer any questions.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington gathers from what the majority leader has just said that he is not desirous of bringing up the Selective Service Act on Monday unless there are no comments to be offered on the unfinished business, namely, the bill (H. R.

6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, to amend the public assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes. Am I correct in so understanding?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator understands the Senator from Illinois correctly.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. FLANDERS. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington whether he will yield to me for 15 minutes, provided he can obtain unanimous consent of the Senate that he will not lose the floor in the process.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, because the Senator from Vermont has indicated to the Senator from Washington that he is most desirous of making a statement and then attending to other duties, if the Senator from Washington can so yield, he will be pleased to do so, provided he does not thereby lose the floor.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Washington may yield to me for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request must come from the Senator who has the floor.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield 15 minutes to the Senator from Vermont, without prejudice to my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 15 minutes.

ENDING THE COLD WAR—IX

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, I am continuing my weekly suggestions with regard to our foreign policy. I have concluded that the general subject to which I address myself may perhaps be better expressed in the words "Ending the cold war" rather than "Winning the cold war." This change is made because the word "winning" carries with it the counterpart idea of a conflict in which one side wins and the other loses. Our cold war is not that kind of conflict. It can be ended by both sides winning. It is for that reason that I choose now to select the phrase "ending the cold war" as the general topic to which I address myself.

In our present dangerous situation we seek a fresh approach to this world problem. Mr. President, I believe that that fresh approach is ready at our hand.

The first requirement is that we shall have the imagination to conceive as to what is going on in the minds of the people of Russia and of the satellite States. It is reasonable to believe that we know what is going on in the minds of the men of the Politburo. Our actions would not lead one to believe that we had given any thought to what is going on in the minds of the Russian people. As an example of the use of intelligent imagination in understanding the Russian people I would call the attention of the Senate to the last page of the June 16 United States News. It is an editorial by David Lawrence entitled "As a Russian Might Speak." It is an imaginary letter of what a Russian citizen might write to a friend abroad, being based on present-day happenings as they might appear to a Russian mind. I now proceed to read the letter:

MOSCOW, JUNE 1950.

The news comes from America, sometimes through American radio broadcasts, mostly through our newspapers.

We learn that America is spending billions of dollars on technical apparatus, new weapons and new instruments of war.

We learn that America can manufacture many, many weapons—perhaps more weapons than we can make.

We wonder what it all means.

Does it mean that the Americans are preparing to kill me and my wife and my children?

We read that the Americans have picked out 70 of our cities on which to drop atom bombs. Think of it—70 cities to be wiped out suddenly. We hear about many new airplanes the Americans are making to carry those bombs to our cities and villages.

We read that the President of the United States says he will not hesitate to use the atom bomb on us—men, women, and children—as he ordered done in Japan. We hear now that he is going to have the hydrogen bomb, too.

So the Americans are planning to murder me and my wife and my children!

The Americans tell us on the radio that they are humane, that they are moral, that they are Christian, that they are interested in benefiting mankind—but what I want to know is why do they plan to kill me and my wife and my children.

I have thought about this a long time. I have begun to wonder—maybe they excuse it because they think we in Russia are planning to send bombs to America to kill their men, women, and children. I know the Americans keep saying they are enlarging their armed forces only for defense. Is that true?

They want us to believe that only the Russian Government is planning to go to war—that we are aggressors. I read the newspapers and I hear the radio—our government denies again and again that it intends to make war. Our government talks constantly of wanting peace.

Maybe in America the Government is saying to the Americans that it wants peace and is not going to go to war except for defense. And maybe the Americans believe their Government—just as we believe our government.

What can we believe? If my government here in Moscow really intends evil, what can I do about it? Revolt against the government? Even if we wished to do so, I and my neighbors cannot begin a revolution without arms. We are not told who would help us. Do they expect us to turn on the government, which after all is now our only protection against the Americans?

I must either allow myself and my wife and my children to be killed by the Americans or I must support my government. I can be destroyed either by the bullets of my government or by the bombs of the American Government.

We are as patriotic as the Americans. If it is true that the Americans are now organizing a military alliance of 12 governments to fight against us, every one of us in Russia must organize to fight those 12 countries. We must resist the invader as we have done in past history. It is better for us to sacrifice things—to go without butter and make guns. We must be ready to die for our country.

Who is there to bring peace to us all? Is there no way to end what they call in America the "cold war"? Why do the two governments do nothing?

We hear the American Government say it does not trust our government. Then we read that the American Secretary of State says they will be willing to negotiate some day. With whom? With a government it doesn't trust? This confuses me.

All we hear is military talk, North Atlantic Pact, military assistance, collective forces, new atom shells to be fired from tanks, more B–36's and more bombs. Also the Americans are talking of rearming the Germans again. To fight whom? Us, of course.

We are 200,000,000 people. What can America do for us that our government isn't doing for us now? Has anybody explained this?

People are tired of war talk. We want peace. How can we get it?

Has anyone in America or Europe any plan except to threaten to kill me and my wife and children?

I wish the Voice of America could tell me soon over the radio that the American Government will not point its guns at us any longer but will begin to think of how my wife and my children and my neighbors and their children can be saved from war. We, too, want to live.

Mr. President, this letter poses the problem. It stands directly in the line of vision of the blind spot in our foreign policy. No one who plays a game or follows a sport can safely neglect to estimate what is in the other men's minds. But in this game of the life and death of nations and civilizations there is no evidence that we have tried to fathom the minds of the Russian people, and it is in the people, rather than in the rulers, that the world's ultimate hope lies of escape from chaos and destruction.

While our official foreign policy is blind to this, the people of this country are not. Individual after individual has written to me and come to me with fears and hopes and plans for getting in touch with the people behind the iron curtain. One well-worked-out plan by a leading advertising expert would bring a flood of printed propaganda behind the curtain and seek for chinks and links and crevices through which it might penetrate. On April 25 I mentioned the deep concern of Mr. Polowsky, who was in the patrol which made the first contact with the Russians when they met on the Elbe. One organization with responsible backing has been formed for this purpose. They are the Friends of European Freedom, and are doing good work, which, to some extent, parallels the Voice of America, our only real offensive activity in this cold war.

There is a ground-swell of sentiment in this Nation for getting in touch with the people of Russia. There is spiritual strength in this swell. Its potentialities exceed, and are capable of submerging, the economic factors and the crude appeals to force. It is a spiritual movement from people to people, with our own administration apparently oblivious to the existence of spiritual force.

One wave of this current swell has originated with the Veterans of Foreign Wars, an institution which by its nature is deeply concerned with our danger of slipping into the abyss of world war III. The members of this organization fought for our country on foreign soil. They know what war means and has meant. They know that it will mean far more terrible things in physical suffering, social chaos, and the destruction of liberties than did World War II. They know that again, as in World War I and World War II, victory will not bring peace. They know that in world war III the victors will be vanquished.

Mr. President, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, I am told, are enthusiastically committed to a three-step program. With any assurance of administrative backing they would form a patriotic organization to project the spirit and will of the American people through the Russian curtain into the eyes and ears and hearts of the people of Russia. This would be done in news sheets, leaflets, magazines, and radio programs.

Along with this should go a stepping up of the use of existing Government agencies to pour information into Russia and her satellites. This was the purpose of Senate Resolution 243, submitted by the junior Senator from Connecticut, of which I, myself, was one of the 13 sponsors from both sides of the aisle.

The third step would be to create underground machinery for penetrating the iron curtain with this gospel of friendship, understanding, and cooperation. The agents of this crusade would be the Russian escapees now in Europe. I have had letters from more than one of them indicating their desire to do something constructive instead of rusting their lives away in exile. The means are at hand. Let us use them.

Surely, Mr. President, here is a plan worth getting behind and supporting. When soldiers work for peace and present a clear-cut plan for undertaking it, the rest of the country, and certainly its Government, cannot refuse its support.

Mr. President, and I speak now both to the President of the Senate and to the President of the United States, let us go on the offensive and end the cold war.

Mr. President, I express my thanks to the Senator from Washington for yielding to me in order that I might make the statement.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me for a statement, not to exceed 10 minutes, relative to an amendment I am submitting to H. R. 6000?

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Senator from California be permitted to speak for 10 minutes without the Senator from Washington losing his right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered, and the Senator from California may proceed.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, I should like to have printed a copy of an amendment which I have heretofore submitted to House bill 6000, to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors insurance system, and so forth, and along with that I should like to have printed immediately following it a telegram which I have received from James G. Bryant, director of employment, California Department of Employment; a telegram from Harry Benge Corzier, chairman, and Dwight Horton, and Dean W. Maxwell, commissioners, of the Texas Employment Commission; and a telegram from Gov. Allan Shivers of Texas.

There being no objection, the amendment and the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT INTENDED TO BE PROPOSED BY MR. KNOWLAND TO H. R. 6000

At the end of the bill add the following:

"PROVISIONS OF STATE UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION LAWS

"SEC. 405. (a) Section 1603 (c) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended (1) by striking out the phrase 'changed its law' and inserting in lieu thereof 'amended its law', and (2) by adding before the period at the end thereof the following: 'and such finding has become effective. Such finding shall become effective on the ninetieth day after the governor of the State has been notified thereof unless the State has before such ninetieth day so amended its law that it will comply substantially with the Secretary's interpretation of the provision of subsection (a), in which event such finding shall not become effective. No finding of a failure to comply substantially with the provision in State law specified in paragraph (5) of subsection (a) shall be based on an application or interpretation of State law with respect to which further administrative or judicial review is provided for under the laws of the State.'

"(b) Section 303 (b) of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: ': Provided, That there shall be no finding under clause (1) until the question of entitlement shall have been decided by the highest judicial authority given jurisdiction under such State law: Provided further, That any costs may be paid with respect to any claimant by a State and included as costs of administration of its law'."

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., June 15, 1950.

Senator WILLIAM KNOWLAND,
Senate Office Building:

Confirming our conversation re amendment to H. R. 6000 the various States are now subject to pressure from Secretary of Labor's office on unemployment insurance benefit decisions if unions disagree with such decisions, as was the case in the maritime conformity issue involving California last December. Under the proposed amendment employers or unions involved must exhaust their judicial remedies in the State courts and until such is done the Secretary of Labor would not be able to raise a conformity question. After decision by the Supreme Court the Secretary of Labor may then raise conformity question and provide the State with opportunity for hearing thereon in the event the Secretary of Labor then made findings of fact and conclusions of law that the State statute as interpreted by the State supreme court did not conform to the standards laid down in section 1603 of the Internal Revenue Code, his decision would be held in abeyance for 90 days in order to permit the State to convene its legislature and amend the State law to bring it into conformity with the Federal standards. Such an amendment is highly desirable in order to achieve proper Federal-State relationship as it affects the unemployment insurance program. The background of the California conformity hearing of last December is being sent you under separate cover, air mail, today.

JAMES G. BRYANT,
Director of Employment, California Department of Employment.

AUSTIN, TEX., June 15, 1950.

Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

The Texas Employment Commission warmly commends you for sponsoring amendment to H. R. 6000. We are sure all of the State agencies are grateful to you.

HARRY BENGE CORZIER,
Chairman.
DWIGHT HORTON,
Commissioner.
DEAN W. MAXWELL,
Commissioner.

AUSTIN, TEX., January 15, 1950.

Senator WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Your amendment to H. R. 6000 is highly appreciated by me as I am sure it is by governors of other States.

ALLAN SHIVERS,
Governor of Texas.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, the unemployment-compensation amendment I propose is made necessary by recent events to which I shall refer.

As we know, the Federal unemployment-compensation-tax laws impose a 3-percent tax on employers. When a State has an unemployment-compensation law containing provisions specified in the Federal law, employers subject to the State law receive a 90-percent credit against the 3-percent Federal tax, and accordingly pay one-tenth of that amount, or three-tenths of 1 percent. The States under the Social Security Act receive Federal grants covering their entire administrative costs in operating their systems. Today every State is receiving these grants and employers covered by every State system are receiving this 90-percent credit against the Federal tax.

The Secretary of Labor is required under existing law, on December 31 of each year, to certify for the 90-percent tax credit against the Federal tax each State whose law has been approved as containing the provisions required in the Federal law. However, he is not to certify if he finds either that the State has so changed its law that it no longer contains the required provisions, or that the State has failed during the year to comply substantially with these provisions. On such a finding he can withhold tax credit certification. Without the Secretary's certification, taxpayers of the State must pay an additional penal Federal tax of nine times their normal tax, in addition to any State tax. Furthermore, the Federal grants to the State for all administrative purposes will be withheld.

During more than a decade of operation before the authority over tax credit was transferred to the Labor Department, although there have been thousands of claims decisions, no hearing was ever held on the question of State conformity to the Federal law arising from such decisions. But there were hearings last December, just before the deadline for tax credit certification, on the question of whether the States of California and Washington would be certified.

Neither State was accused of failing to conform to the federally required provision by virtue of a legislative change in its law or by virtue of its court's interpretation of its law. Each State was cited to a hearing in Washington, D. C., because of mere appealable administrative applications of the law in certain claims cases. Nobody can know how the claims would have been decided under the State law, as the claimants had not completed the normal procedure under that law of establishing their rights.

What happened was that late last November both States were notified to appear at the Labor Department, and in December were tried by a minor official of that Department on the issue of the State being out of conformity—because of these appealable administrative claims actions.

These States escaped the penalty of having their grants withheld and the State unemployment compensation taxpayers of these States escaped in excess of $200,000,000 in tax penalties only because the State agencies agreed at the last minute to meet the Secretary's demands.

Thus, even assuming that the initial claims actions complained of were incorrect, and contrary to the Federal provisions, it is utterly disruptive of State administration of its law for the Secretary to concern himself with this kind of day-to-day appealable action. It disrupts all the State corrective machinery, and interjects the Federal administrators into the State administrative processes, in effect denying to the State court charged with the duty of final action the right to hear and correct administrative errors.

Yet, because of his conclusion that certain appealable administrative actions were erroneous, the Secretary insisted that the State itself should be held out of conformity and denied grants, and that employers subject to that act be penalized an extra tax equal to 2.7 percent of their payrolls for the year unless the State administrator immediately capitulated to the Secretary's requirements.

Such a development raises a vital issue—whether the State claims procedure is to be scrapped. So far, the Secretary has actually intervened between the highest level of administrative decision and appeal to the State courts for interpretation and application of State law. Tomorrow he may step in between initial claims action and the administrative appeal from such action. It is not compatible with State administration that the Federal Secretary of Labor, rather than the review forum specified in State law, should pass on day-to-day problems. The Federal interest is certainly amply protected by the Secretary awaiting a final decision of the State on a case before deciding that the State is out of conformity.

The proposed amendment clarifies congressional intent as to the point at which the Secretary may act to hold a State out of conformity. It merely requires that the Secretary shall not intervene in State proceedings on appealable matters, but shall act only after the State itself has spoken finally through its highest appeal forum. This provision merely gives the State an opportunity to follow through its prescribed procedure in determining whether to give or deny benefits to the claimants in question. The limitation on the Secretary's action in no way deprives him of his subsequent authority to determine whether the State is or is not out of conformity with the Federal statute after the review procedure of the State has been completed.

The second important provision of the amendment gives the State a 90-day period to get in conformity after the Secretary has held the State to be out of conformity. In the two cases previously cited, the State administrators were able to meet the Secretary's demands because the claims in question had not become a matter of court decision. The situation may be that it is a court interpretation rather than an administrative interpretation which the Secretary finds to throw the State out of conformity with Federal standards. In such a situation it would be impossible to obtain immediate compliance by administrative action, as occurred in the two recent cases. It would be necessary to convene the legislature after the court decision, and where the decision is late in the year legislative action might be impossible before the December 31 deadline. After this deadline, State legislative action could not relieve the State of the penalties. The amendment would merely give the State a 90-day compliance period and relieve the State of the penalties of the Secretary's action if, and only if, the State conformed with the Secretary's interpretation of the Federal standard within this 90 days.

Mr. President, I think that all Members of the Senate who have expressed an interest in States' rights and in proper administrative procedures in the several States of the Union which have a responsibility should support this amendment.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington has been very much interested in what the Senator from California has stated, and wishes now to associate himself with the views expressed by the Senator from California. He joins with the Senator from California in hoping sincerely that the amendment proposed by him will be adopted by the Senate next week.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I should like to take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation to the Senator from Washington for yielding. One of the cases to which I referred grew out of a situation in the State of Washington. I think the amendment involves a question of tremendous importance to every Member of the Senate. The reason I took the opportunity of interrupting the Senator from Washington at this point was because I wanted the material, which included a telegram from the Governor of Texas, from the Texas Commission on Unemployment, and from the State of California, to be in the RECORD so that it might be examined by Members of the Senate as background material on this subject.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, when the junior Senator from Washington yielded late yesterday afternoon to make way for a conference report on the bill (H. R. 2143) to amend the Hatch Act the Senator from Washington was discussing the pending business, House bill 6000, and was when interrupted analyzing the Finance Committee report on House bill 6000. The Senator from Washington hopes to conclude this analysis within the hour.

The argument which the Senator from Washington has been and is presenting is being offered in the hope that appropriate committees of the Congress will shortly undertake to recommend to the Congress and the Nation a new social-security system to replace our prevailing system which was established in 1935. It is generally admitted by both those who advocate and those who resist the passage of House bill 6000 in this session of the Congress that our prevailing social-security system has fallen so far short of achieving its objective, which is that of providing for the legitimate needs of America's aged population, and is so possessed of fundamental and basic faults and inequities, that this system must be replaced in time, and the sooner the better, with a system which would probably provide for universal coverage and be maintained on a true pay-as-you-go or annual basis. In recognition of this obvious need the Committee on Finance has offered a resolution to authorize and encourage a study of every possible social-security system. The Senator from Washington is of the considered view that this study and the resulting recommendations ought to be made before House bill 6000 is passed. It seems, however, to be the consensus of opinion that House bill 6000 ought to be and will be approved by the Senate next Tuesday. The Senator from Washington is offering his criticisms of House bill 6000 in an effort to be of constructive assistance to any group which may be formed to encourage future social-security improvements which are so imperatively required.

Mr. President, in recent weeks the junior Senator from Washington has carried on correspondence with a number of persons throughout the United States for whose judgment and ability he has considerable respect. A good many of these persons to whom the Senator from Washington has written represent American corporations and companies in which Americans by the tens of millions have invested their savings. It seems to the Senator from Washington that others aside from himself—and I think this is likely to be so—ought to be terrifically and thoughtfully interested in the observations which have been made to the Senator from Washington by those who now manage, and have so successfully managed in recent decades, the savings which belong to the American people. I have before me at the moment only two letters, which I wish to read. The first one was received under date of June 13, 1950, and was written by Mr. J. W. Scherr, Jr., executive vice president of the Inter-Ocean Insurance Co., which has its executive offices in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. Scherr writes as follows:

SIR: I was indeed interested in your speech before the Senate on the subject of an investigation of the social-security program. Apropos to this subject, I have just returned from a meeting in New York of the Health and Accident Underwriters Conference and as might be expected, your stand on the question of H. R. 6000 and the future of our social-security system has commanded the respect of the entire insurance industry. I assure you that those of us who deal in probabilities and who are vitally concerned with the economic welfare of the people of this country are not entirely selfish in our opposition to further extension of the program. We feel that any system which completely ignores the insurance principle must eventually fall by its own weight and we are prepared to help you fight your battle with the tools at hand.

Mr. Scherr goes on to say:

I am today sending the following telegram to Senators WALTER GEORGE, HARRY BYRD, EUGENE MILLIKIN, HUGH BUTLER, and ROBERT A. TAFT.

The telegram is quoted as follows:

Urge that you act favorably on Cain resolution 92. H. R. 6000 not compatible with insurance principle and can virtually destroy our economy. Reconsideration of entire social-security program essential to future of country.

Mr. Scherr concludes his letter by saying this:

I appreciate the urgency of this matter and feel that the strategy which you have employed to defeat H. R. 6000 or to delay action on this bill represents a great service to the Nation.

Cordially yours.

Mr. President, I should like to say to Mr. Scherr, in reply, at this time, that the junior Senator from Washington has stated what he feels to be a fact, that H. R. 6000 will be passed in the Senate of the United States next Tuesday. The Senator from Washington is very grateful to be a medium through which the views of Mr. Scherr and other thoughtful actuarial students can be offered to the Senate.

The junior Senator from Washington feels that the contributions to be made by Mr. Scherr and his associates throughout this land will constitute a prime case to lay before whatever commission or group or committee is established, either by the Senate or by the House, or by both branches of the Congress, to reexamine the system and make recommendations for the future with respect to the social-security program needs of the people of the United States of America.

Mr. President, under date of May 23, 1950, I received a letter which was signed by Mr. Charles J. Haugh, who is the secretary of the Travelers Insurance Co., with offices in Hartford Conn. I take it that probably there is no American living anywhere in this great country who does not recognize the name of the Travelers Insurance Co. to be a byword throughout the land. The secretary of that company is a gentleman who, together with his colleagues, takes our money, turns over to us insurance policies in lieu of that money, and promptly proceeds to so invest and make secure our savings that when the policies come due we not only will receive the total number of dollars called for in the policies, but the dollars we receive will have a maximum of purchasing power contained within them.

The Travelers Insurance Co.'s official point of view, then, with reference to the pending bill—and their views ought to be of concern to most Americans—is as follows:

I am writing in reply to your letter of May 12 relative to the social-security bill (H. R. 6000) which is about to be considered by the Senate.

As you so clearly state, an effective revision of the Social Security Act designed to accomplish the objectives which are generally understood to be sought by such legislation can best be accomplished only after a thorough independent investigation by a commission comprised of individuals well versed in this field.

Unless and until a well-thought-out study is made, it is inevitable that the social security program will be subjected to perennial assault of well-meaning, but ill-advised individuals who seek to remedy defects (either real or imagined) by legislation which may create two problems where only one grew before, and by individuals who seek to use the social-security program as a means of injecting the Federal Government into any and every kind of business pursuit possible. In saying this, I do not in any way intend to cast aspersions on individuals merely because they propose to revise the social-security laws of the country. I merely want to stress the fact that the problem is an extremely technical one and, as such, offers opportunity to seriously involve an already complicated situation and also offers a medium for adroit individuals to seek in an indirect way to accomplish an objective which, if clearly made known, would be rejected vigorously by the Congress. It is only sound logic to seek the advice of technicians before reaching a conclusion.

Parenthetically, I would suggest that with reference to the present we are not inclined, as a Senate, to seek the advice of technicians before reaching a conclusion. We are determined to reach a conclusion on Tuesday next. It is simply the hope of the Senator from Washington, and now of Mr. Hall, of the Travelers Insurance Co., and a goodly number of other Americans, that in the near future, after we have taken action on and approved H. R. 6000, we shall seek advice from the best qualified technicians of the United States, and ask them, "What have we so recently done without first seeking your advice and your counsel?"

Mr. KERR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. KERR. Is it not entirely possible that H. R. 6000 represents the result not only of research by experts and technicians, referred to by the distinguished Senator from Washington, but also of the best thinking of the members of the Committee on Finance? And is it not possible that it might represent a great improvement over the present social-security law, and be far better than what we now have, and yet still not be the ultimate we hope eventually to have?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Oklahoma has posed a reasonable question, for which I think there is a reasonable answer. I have been advised, and I think correctly, that no study has yet been made by either the Senate Finance Committee, or by the technicians employed by that committee, of social-security systems other than the one which has been in force in this country since 1935. The junior Senator from Washington hopes and expects that some or perhaps all the amendments offered by the Senate Committee on Finance to H. R. 6000 are designed to improve a particular system. What the Senator from Washington has been suggesting is that in his view anyway, it would have been better to examine other systems before seriously endeavoring to patch up a system which the proponents of H. R. 6000 have told us in the Senate must eventually, and they hope soon, be replaced by a different system.

Mr. KERR. Has the Senator seen the document of blue paper which has been placed on the desk of each Senator since the beginning of the debate?

Mr. CAIN. I have not personally seen it.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, would the Senator be surprised to know that that document contains a tabulation, first, of the provisions of the present law with reference to our social-security system; second, a tabulation showing the difference between the present law with reference to each item of H. R. 6000, as passed by the House, and, third, the difference between the present law and H. R 6000, as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance with reference to each one of the main provisions? Furthermore, is not the Senator from Washington aware that the Senate Finance Committee had the bill before it for some 3 months of hearing, and had the benefit of the recommendations of its own advisory council, which had worked on the matter for some 2 years or longer with reference to each one of those points?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington is aware in general of what the Senator from Oklahoma has just said. The Senator from Washington merely returns to the premise that no examination of any other possible system has been made or deeply studied or reflected upon, so far as the Senator from Washington knows, by the advisory council, by the Senate Finance Committee, by the staff of that committee, or by any technicians employed by it, because the Senate Finance Committee conceived that it was confronted with a very practical matter—the need for improving, insofar as it was possible for them to do, the existing system.

Mr. KERR. Then the Senator would really be surprised to know that the advisory council studied all known social-security laws, and that testimony with reference to many of them was brought to the Senate Committee on Finance. If the Senator would read the documents to which he referred yesterday, as I recall, in terms of their weight, embracing the two volumes I hold in my hand, the facts I have stated would be apparent to him.

Mr. CAIN. The junior Senator from Washington expects pretty soon to be able to refer to the same 11 or 12 pounds of hearings and reports on the basis of his having read them, sir, from beginning to end. That task has just been undertaken and is by no means completed, and certainly will not be completed by Tuesday of next week.

Mr. KERR. Then, the Senator is doing what he thought maybe the Finance Committee did when he said they recommended a bill and then decided to study the matter, in that the Senator from Washington is advising against the bill and after having done so expects to read the hearings with reference to it?

Mr. CAIN. No, I think that is not so.

Mr. KERR. Maybe I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CAIN. I think in part the Senator has, I have not read all the hearings, though I have read a good part of them. Particularly have I read the testimony offered by those who dissent from the provisions of H. R. 6000. When the junior Senator from Washington says he considers that the advisory committee has not given thoughtful, thorough attention to the merits of other social-security systems, he thinks he is on very sound ground. There is a difference between an advisory committee giving, if not lip service, at least casual service to a study of other systems and giving the other systems a comprehensive going over.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. CAIN. I am pleased to yield, sir.

Mr. KERR. In our search for perfection, would the Senator think that we should use the exclusive method of waiting until it had been fully achieved before making any change, or would he countenance the possibility of merit in approaching it gradually and by stages?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington would think that every question of that character would have to be considered on its individual merits. He takes the position, from which a majority of the Members of the Senate are going to dissent that a new approach to our social-security problems in this country could be recommended and established in about a 2-year period. He does not see an impelling need for liberalizing and expanding a system which its chief proponents and defenders on the floor of the Senate tell us they think must be replaced by another system.

Mr. KERR. I should like to give the Senator the information that the advisory council of the Senate Finance Committee, which, by the way, I believe was created during the time we had what was known as the Republican Eightieth Congress——

Mr. CAIN. Yes.

Mr. KERR. And the Republicans had a majority of members on the committee.

Mr. CAIN. The chairman then, the distinguished junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] and his fellows, began the undertaking of a very serious study. But I take it that the Senator from Colorado, together with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the present able and distinguished chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, will not maintain on this floor, as in fact they said otherwise the other day on this floor, that those studies undertaken during the Eightieth Congress have by any means been completed.

Mr. KERR. No; the position is not taken that they have been completed, but neither is there a feeling on the part of the committee at this time that the studies were entirely without effect, or that no progress whatever was made, but that on the contrary, much progress was made, and based upon the studies and recommendations, further progress was made by the Finance Committee in its very extended study and hearings on the bill this year.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington has not maintained that some progress has not been achieved.

Mr. KERR. Then, if it has been achieved, does not the Senator think that the Congress might be wise to take advantage of that which has been done and implement it by this proposed legislation, and yet look forward to a further continuance of the study in the hope that still greater progress may be made?

Mr. CAIN. At this time the junior Senator from Washington would by no means agree. The Senator from Washington and the Senator from Oklahoma and other Senators know the approximate number of persons now paying in to the social security system. We know approximately the number of Americans who are benefiting from that system. We know that for a very limited period of time we are going to be able to take in money much more rapidly than we are required to pay it out. We are presently suggesting a liberalization of the benefits to go to the beneficiaries of this system at this time purely, it seems to me, because we are financially in a position so to do.

I think it was about 2 or 3 days ago that other Senators on this floor, in answer to a question relating to financial matters, said that in their view the reserve fund would not be in jeopardy or in possible trouble for the next 4 or 5 years. Beyond that they would not venture a guess, because 4 or 5 years from now it stands to reason that many, many additional persons will be drawing benefits from the system.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is aware of the fact, is he not, that the committee took into consideration not only the fact that the fund had certain amounts of reserves, but that the compelling reason for the liberalization of the provisions of the law was not on the basis of the amount of money in the reserves, but on the basis of the need and the equitable considerations with reference to those participating in the program?

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Oklahoma is scratching a fundamental at the moment. I think we are all in agreement that we are only willing to double, on the average, the benefits to go to the aged who are members of the social security system, because in the past 15 years we have cut the value of the American dollar just about in two. Because we have a system today which takes in much more than it has to give out, in the immediate future we are in a much better position to move much more rapidly in liberalizing the benefits, without giving too much consideration as to what our financial involvement is to be possibly 4 or 5 or 10 or 15 or 20 years from now.

Mr. KERR. Then the Senator recognizes, does he not, that there is some considerable merit to moving, to the extent that we feel we can do so, to meet that increased need of those who now are benefiting or participating in the program?

Mr. CAIN. I feel that my Government, of which I and the Senator from Oklahoma, the Senator from Colorado, and all other Americans are a very proud part, has recognized an obligation to the aged of America. In resisting in what I think is a reasonable way the enactment of House bill 6000, I do so because I hope that before very long there will be an admission by everyone of what is simply a fact, and that we shall establish in this country a social-security system which will offer—offer, by the way, because many persons ought to turn it down—to every aged American what is offered to other aged Americans, whereas our present social-security system, if continued in this country for a thousand years, would, in my opinion, never achieve that objective.

Mr. KERR. Then the Senator will admit, will he not, that the bill now being considered is a great improvement over the present law?

Mr. CAIN. I think I have not maintained otherwise. What I have maintained is that whatever may be the merits of the suggested new law—and there are considerable merits to it, upon some of which the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma has just commented—it still remains a fact, and a very distressing one, that we are extending and broadening a system which we recognize possesses faults of such a nature that in time—and I merely stress the rapid passage of time—it must be replaced with an entirely different system.

I am not unmindful of the fact that Members on both sides of the aisle of the United States Senate have been saying, in the course of this debate, "We are going to adopt a resolution authorizing a study." I am so hopeful of the results of that study that I have done my best to provide in the RECORD certain arguments which that study group will want to examine, along with arguments offered before it by, I hope, thousands of groups and interested persons in the land.

Mr. KERR. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma most sincerely.

Mr. President, I should like to read now the last several paragraphs of the letter written to me by the secretary of the Travelers Insurance Co. Its author, Mr. Haugh, concludes by saying the following:

> When it comes to suggesting individuals who might be considered to serve on a commission to make a study of this nature, I am naturally inclined to lean to the type of individual whose training and experience is such as to afford him a good knowledge of the economic and administrative problems which are involved. It is for this reason that I suggest consultation with the Casualty Actuarial Society and with the Society of Actuaries. They can be reached as follows: Mr. Harmon T. Barber, president, Casualty Actuarial Society, care of the Travelers Insurance Co., 700 Main Street, Hartford, Conn.; Mr. Edmund L. McConney, president, Society of Actuaries, care of Bankers Life Co., Des Moines, Iowa.

I shall not suggest specific individuals within these organizations as I would prefer to leave that to the organizations themselves. Neither do I suggest that any such commission be comprised entirely of actuaries.

I sincerely trust that you will be successful in your effort to have this matter thoroughly studied by a competent commission so that any modification of the Social Security Act which may be adopted will be adopted in the light of full consideration of all facts and with full knowledge of the effects of such legislation, both immediate and ultimate.

Very truly yours,

CHAS. J. HAUGH,
Secretary.

I would simply say to Mr. Haugh that I am not speaking only for myself, Mr. President, but I believe I am speaking for a good many persons of like mind. Those to whom I have referred and I, likewise, will continue to be anxious and hopeful that any study group established and authorized by the Congress will undertake a serious analysis of the social-security needs of the aged population of the United States, in order that in the years soon to come we shall have replaced the present system, with all its faults and all its inequities, with a system which will provide as much justice to one aged American as it provides to any other such person.

Mr. President, if House bill 6000 is passed, it seems to me that it will only result in paying old-age and survivors benefits to 2,700,000 persons during the coming year; but as the coverage expands and as the number of insured reach retirement age and claim benefits, then the threat of trouble will begin.

Mr. President, let me say parenthetically that we are not in trouble at this time with reference to our American social-security system, but I think we are headed for trouble, and, in my opinion, it is quite proper to run up a flag of warning in this year of 1950.

The step rate tax rises come at intervals beginning in 1956, 6 years from now. Then the race starts between the social-security tax income and the benefit outgo. If the benefit outgo exceeds the tax income, and if the trust fund is absorbed, and there is a very good likelihood that that will occur, then there will be nothing but brass knuckles and a club in the shape of increased taxes to keep the system from bankruptcy.

Mr. President, I quote now from page 33 of the report:

> Estimates of the future costs of the old-age and survivors insurance program are affected by many factors that are hard to determine.

That statement is the truth, if the truth ever was spoken.

The report further says, on page 34, that there has been recommended—

> A tax schedule which * * * will make the system self-supporting as nearly as can be foreseen under present circumstances.

How is this masterpiece of self-support demonstrated? It is demonstrated by a series of actuarial tables, presumably prepared under the eagle eye of Robert Myers, the chief actuary of the Social Security Administration. Mr. President, every once in a while a person is entitled to make a guess as to the author of a particular work, and I have made mine. If we look closely at these tables, however, we shall find escape hatches scattered along the way. In reading further from the report, on page 37 we find this statement:

> The range of error in the estimates may be fully as great for contributions as it is for benefits.

Certainly that is a very reassuring statement.

Furthermore, Mr. President, we find the following on page 33 of the report:

> Because of numerous factors such as the aging of the population of the country and the inherent slow but steady growth of the benefit roll in any retirement insurance program, benefit payments may be expected to increase continuously for at least the next 50 years.

Of that there can be no doubt. We know for a fact that the number of old persons in the country is increasing. We also know that the greater the number who are taken into the system, the greater the number—always assuming that no trick conditions to throw old persons out of the system will be invented—who will claim benefits.

Mr. President, on what basis have the estimates been prepared? They are prepared by making a whole series of calculations, and those calculations, required to be made in the absence of certain obtainable facts, are based on a variety of factors—continued high employment being one of them. As one of the escape hatches, table 19, based on unfavorable economic assumptions, is inserted on page 50 of the report.

Then there are figured out low-cost estimates and high-cost estimates and out of these two we get a blend called intermediate-cost estimates. Says the report, at page 43:

> It should be recognized that these intermediate-cost estimates do not represent the most probable estimates, since it is impossible to develop any such figures. Rather, they have been set down as a convenient and readily available single set of figures to use for comparative purposes. Also, a single intermediate figure is necessary in the development of a tax schedule which will make the system self-supporting.

If that set of sentences says anything, it says that intermediate cost estimates are not the most probable ones, since any such probable figures are impossible to develop; yet, for all that, the intermediate figures are essential to figure out taxes that will make the system self-supporting. That is as clear as crystal, is it not?

What all this fancy figure work comes down to is this: The Social Security actuaries do not know. They will not admit it in so many words—and I can understand that—but the fact remains, they do not know.

We do know that the number of old people in the country is increasing. We likewise know that if H. R. 6000 passes, coverage will be expanded and the number of oncoming benefit claimants must inexorably expand.

But whether the social-security-tax income will be sufficient to pay these benefits Mr. Altmeyer does not know, and his actuaries do not know, and nobody on earth knows. That is why this question excites the curiosity and interest of many of us.

So we are going to proceed arbitrarily to increase benefits out of current income, knowing, and having a reason to know, that the day must come when the brass-knuck taxes must be socked to the young boys and girls in their first jobs, who right now are being told, and encouraged to think, that they are paying for some kind of annuity.

There was a man, not so many years ago, who briefly succeeded with a variation of this scheme. His name was Charles Ponzi, and he eventually landed in jail. What the prospects are for our Social Security officials getting into deep trouble in the future is unknown at the moment.

What I have suggested is that if we look for some solid basis for cost estimates we do not find facts sufficient to give us reassurance about the future.

What I have said is that if we look for some solid basis for cost estimates we do not find any.

Remember that I have suggested that this is a Siamese-twin system and that, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, they must be considered together.

Look, for example, at some of the things the report tells us about the year 1970, only 20 years hence.

Table No. 7, found on page 35, tells us that in 1970 the number of men and women 65 and over in the United States will be anywhere from 15,900,000 to 18,500,000. A wide range of estimate, I would say.

Then table 9, found on page 38, gives us the estimated number of old people in 1970 drawing benefits—that is, the number of primary beneficiaries and the widows and the parents.

The range of such old beneficiaries runs, according to these calculations, from a little over 6,000,000 to a little over 9,000,000.

In other words, Mr. Altmeyer's lowest estimate of the number 65 and over in 1970 is 15,900,000 persons, almost 16,000,000 human beings. I refer to table 7, on page 35.

On the other hand, his highest estimate of OASI aged beneficiaries is a little over 9,000,000—to be exact, 9,117,000—table 9, page 38. However, it is sliced, 20 years hence, according to Altmeyer calculations, there will still be, at the very least, more than 6,000,000 persons 65 and over not drawing benefits from the social-security system.

Yet we are told in the face of these tables—whatever they may be worth—that the costs of old-age assistance may be expected to decrease.

To finish piecing out this jigsaw puzzle let us turn to the sacred wage record system.

Everyone who works in a covered category, however briefly, and who has paid social-security taxes has a wage record in Baltimore, Md.

Mr. Altmeyer told the Finance Committee last January—page 29, Senate hearings—that there are 80,000,000 individual wage records in the files. This does not mean at all that 80,000,000 persons are insured. Indeed, says Mr. Altmeyer, "at any one time we estimate that there are only about 35,000,000 workers actually in insured employment." What it means is that 80,000,000 persons, over and above current benefit-receiving old people, have worked in covered employment at one time or another and established a wage record if only for a few months.

It has been said that to handle these 80,000,000 accounts a rental of more than a million dollars a year is paid to International Business Machines. Whether this is true or not I do not know, for Mr. Altmeyer does not seem to have been very explicit on this point.

These 80,000,000 records are supposed to represent live accounts. Some of the persons with records in Baltimore may be, and probably are, dead. But some method has been figured out to discard dead people, and the 80,000,000 are presumed to be alive, if not all of them kicking.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] last January—page 30, Senate hearings—said to Mr. Altmeyer that the amount of money which the Federal Government had received from these persons, now uncovered or perhaps dead—and I quote the Senator—"runs into many hundreds of millions of dollars." Said Mr. Altmeyer, "I think this is true."

But, said the Senator from Maine, "Do you intend to keep that up forever? Sometime you will have to make a check, will you not?"

Mr. Altmeyer's rejoinder to this was as follows—page 31, Senate hearings:

> What we have to do, of course, is to use the various avenues of public information. Some streetcar companies, for example, have given us free space for those cards you see inside of streetcars. We have not resorted to loudspeakers and that sort of thing. * * * We get out explanatory pamphlets. We send those pamphlets to groups that we think would be particularly interested, like labor organizations and employers, and we have a very definite program of local contact by our local managers. We try in every way to tell people what their potential rights are, but we do not have any way of maintaining individual contact with each one of these 80,000,000.

I am told that it requires more than 6,000 persons to look after these records. I should think it would.

Pamphlets we have, though no loud speakers, and an amount paid in through these slumbering accounts of sums running perhaps to hundred of millions of dollars.

Did I say that this system was a Rube Golberg invention? Goldberg, in his most extreme flight of fancy, never dreamed up anything to equal what the Social Security Administration has done.

On these wage records, supposedly, are based the various sums that beneficiaries are paid. But when these formulas have to be arbitrarily changed and benefits shifted in order to get the right answers, what is the value of all these records?

The truth is that the longer one looks at it the more it becomes apparent that aged human beings are not the concern of the system at all. What Mr. Altmeyer and his functionaries are concerned about primarily are categories and machinery. They have fixed up a giant's cat's cradle which only they can understand, and it is the cat's cradle that they want to enlarge, expand, and entrench.

They hang on like grim death to their preposterous wage records and at this minute they have a bill over in the Public Works Committee of the House—H. R. 7873 is the bill—asking for $11,500,000 with which to buy land here in the District and construct a building to put those records in.

You will hear people say, Mr. President, that one reason why it is impossible to change this system is that these 80,000,000 persons, living and dead, have paid taxes and hence have acquired a vested right in the present system.

Look a little closer at this so-called vested right, for it is something. Carefully examined, we find it a half-true, half-false, proposition.

It is perfectly true that those 80,000,000 persons have paid taxes for a longer or shorter time, but what is the character of the vested right?

An actuary, after careful scrutiny of H. R. 6000, gives me this picture about the real source of benefits that thousands will receive:

> Consider two men who earn $100 a month and $250 a month, respectively, from 1937 to 1955, each retiring in 1956 at age 68—which is a typical retirement age. Under H. R. 6000 the first man will receive a primary benefit of $50 a month; the second man, one of $72. A very conservative actuarial valuation of their future primary benefits, taking account of some probability of each having a wife or widow qualifying for benefits, would show the first man to get total benefits worth $7,500; the second worth $10,800. The first man has paid in $264 in employee contributions; the second, $660. Interest on these amounts is ignored, as the value of the survivorship insurance received by each is more than the interest. In tabular form the figures and their relationship are as follows:

Average monthly wage	Employee contributions paid	Value of benefits to be received	Rate of contributions to benefits	Excess of value of benefits over contributions
			Percent
$100	$264	$7,500	3.5	$7,236
$250	660	10,800	6.1	10,140

NOTE.—It may be noted that the $250 man has paid a higher proportion of the value of his benefits than the $100 man. But neither has paid a significant proportion anyhow, and each one therefore gets a substantial profit from the system. This profit is derived partly from employer contributions—which are charges on the general public in the shape of higher prices—but largely are from contributions by and on behalf of younger employees.

In other words, Mr. President, the so-called vested rights of many of these people are for benefits that will have to be sweated out of the hides of the younger men and women whose own benefits, in the future, look more than dubious.

All this vested right really amounts to is the fact that 80,000,000 persons, living and dead, have paid social security taxes in varying amounts.

Why make this fact the excuse for getting deeper and deeper in with an unjust, capricious, inflationary, and hopelessly complicated system?

Why not, rather, face the task, if we must, of paying back what those people have paid in, or of squaring the deal in what seems the most reasonable way, and then making a truly fresh start where age is the only qualification and all receive the same sum, raised and paid for year by year, as it must be raised and paid for by those of us who are still at work.

Mr. President, the contention is also made that the Old Age and Survivors Insurance Fund and the payroll tax supporting it, will finally be made universal, with a minimum payment to all persons, augmented by their wage credits acquired as at present. All this is supposed to happen simply by steadily expanding coverage.

I see no prospect of success here, Mr. President. I see only the same old delusions. Some people call what we have now a pay-as-you-go system simply because for the moment the tax income is greater than the benefit out-go.

I notice with tremendous compliment to those involved that in recent days neither the senior Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. GEORGE], nor the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], the ranking minority member of that committee, have made any such contention that we are presently paying as we go in connection with our social security system.

Expand coverage however you will under the present system, but the day of reckoning must come. What right have we to dump this fearful problem on our children and grandchildren, simply because we have not the moral fortitude and energetic imagination to face the truth today?

Mr. President, if this has seemed a lengthy statement I can assure the Senate that in attempting constructively to describe the almost fathomless intricacies of our present siamese-twin system of so-called social security, I have barely scratched the surface.

If we pass House bill 6000, we make even more complicated that which is already complex beyond endurance. It is necessary and healthy for us to admit and know what we do.

As I have said before, we simply make worse a situation where millions of the present aged get no consideration and where millions of future aged have no assurance, whether they pay social-security taxes or not, that they will ever get any benefit.

Mr. President, just a short time ago, on May 24, I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 92 calling for the appointment of a commission of completely independent experts to undertake, full time, divorced from all influence of the Social Security Administration, a complete investigation of the present social security system and an investigation of other possible systems.

I earnestly appeal for support of this resolution.

In the statement which I made when I introduced the resolution, I said:

> Why pass a bill that we know is bad, despite the best efforts of the Finance Committee, when with the expenditure of a little more time we might have legislation that is good?

I can only repeat what I said then and urge that the most serious consideration be given to what I have proposed.

Let us not try to mortgage the future of our children. Let us halt where we are now and try to discover what is best to do. Let us do nothing further to entrench what is fundamentally a cheat, a dishonest system, that does not deserve the name of social security at all.

Mr. President, if Senate Concurrent Resolution 92 is not to be approved by the Senate, then the junior Senator from Washington will place his faith and hope in the results to be achieved from the adoption of the resolution offered this afternoon by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN] for himself and the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I know that if their joint wishes come true, our present social-security system will soon be replaced by a system which offers to one aged American what is offered to every other aged American. These two distinguished Senators have publicly agreed that there is no long-range cure for the fundamental weaknesses to be found in the pending bill which seeks to patch up a social-security system, 1935 model, which is neither now, nor can it be in the future, a reasonable or workable answer to the needs of the aged persons of America. The junior Senator from Washington will appreciate an opportunity to work with the Senators mentioned and other Senators in looking for and establishing the right answer for the needs of the aged who live now and who will live in the future in our great country.

Mr. President, it will take but a very few minutes to summarize my position concerning the pending bill.

Mr. President, when I made my statement on May 24 last, in introducing Concurrent Resolution 92, providing for an investigation of the social-security system, I offered a letter which I had written to several hundred persons throughout the country, persons who in one way or another had had direct experience with social-security problems and had given a great deal of time and thought to them.

The letter which I wrote was as follows:

As you know the social-security bill (H. R. 6000) which passed the House last October, is now before the Senate Finance Committee and shortly will be reported out for Senate action. This bill represents the first major revision made in our social-security legislation since 1939 and is no unimportant piece of legislation. Although we do not yet have the completed Senate bill three committee releases have specified what the bill will contain in respect to old-age assistance and expanded old-age and survivors insurance coverage and benefits.

After considerable thought, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot vote for a bill containing these provisions. Instead, I am urging that the social-security establishment be left as it is, pending a thorough and completely independent investigation and overhauling. This overhauling, it seems to me, should be undertaken by a commission, and carried out along the line specified by former President Hoover in his letter on social-security revision to Chairman Doughton of the House Ways and Means Committee a year ago.

I have become increasingly skeptical about the present deferred-benefit system which excludes—and must continue to exclude—so many of today's aged from our so-called social insurance and gives large benefits to some who qualify after making only token contributions. Back in 1935 when the Social Security Act was first passed, it was assumed that the insurance system with reasonable promptness would cover the old people and that old-age assistance (means test relief supported by Federal subsidies) would soon pass out. The reverse has happened. The groups covered by insurance have slowly expanded; relief for destitute old people has zoomed ahead. What this amounts to is that social-security legislation has pushed many of the States, including my own, into trying to handle these problems through jerry-built relief plans, often practically unsupervised and depending, of course, on Federal subsidy.

Patching up unworkable social-security programs—as H. R. 6000 attempts to do and as any bill of the type will do—is bound to create more maladjustments than it cures. We badly need a fundamental technical study that can lead to a constructive redesign of our social-security system.

My own feeling is that an honest pay-as-you-go system with age the only qualification necessary is probably the answer. The benefit, I suppose, should be a certain number of dollars a month—small enough to indicate the normal expectation of other personal provision and large enough to be of some significance in the income of the recipient. I set neither age nor figures; the Commission's work would have to give us the answer or the basis for an answer. I would suppose that the benefits would be financed by an earmarked tax, from the lowest earnings up to some such maximum as the $3,000 now used in the limited, discriminatory tax now in current use. This simply means that the producing workers of the Nation are paying a tax to aid in the support of the old and by the earmarked tax each knows and is conscious of what he is paying. In no way should such a benefit be regarded as taking the place of personal thrift, nor does it take the place of local charity and relief. The system ought to be designed to get the Federal Government out of the business of subsidizing relief in the States.

I am asking you, as a person whose professional interests have included social-security problems, to let me have your views on this question. I ask that you write me with all frankness about the objectives, the personnel, and the method of study that might be pursued by such a Commission as I have described above. There must be men of standing—independent, competent, and informed in this area—who could help in this task. We ought rightly to expect that such men would represent a truly American approach to these problems—an approach which so far has been sedulously avoided by the official advisory councils.

I am persuaded that this is a matter of vital importance to the preservation of our system of free enterprise and the noncollectivist way of life.

Since the bill will be before the Senate any day now, I appeal to you for a prompt consideration of this letter.

To show the deep feeling which this social-security question has aroused—and I think it is a very healthy feeling, indeed—I shall now refer to and ask permission to insert some of the replies in the RECORD.

If these letters which the junior Senator from Washington has received from competent Americans from every section of the United States do nothing else, I think they will help to convince the Senate that the insurance people, among others—and to the insurance people generally I may say again Americans everywhere in all confidence turn over their savings to be properly invested—are anything but unanimous in their support of our social-security system.

The junior Senator from Washington wishes, and in fact is privileged, to bring the views of such students of the question to the attention of every Senator on both sides of the aisle who now or in the future may become interested in this question.

Mr. President, I should like unanimous consent that a letter from Mr. Elgin Fassel, the actuary of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co. of Milwaukee, be made a part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NORTHWESTERN MUTUAL
LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Milwaukee, Wis., May 19, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senator,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CAIN: I have pleasure in acknowledging your letter of May 11, addressed to me personally and asking my views as to social security. You state the you do not expect to vote for H. R. 6000 and instead are urging no change in social security at this time, and that there be an investigation and overhauling undertaken by a commission along lines suggested by former President Hoover. Also you favor the pay-as-you-go system.

I have long felt that the accumulation plan is a mistake in the social-security system and that it ought to be on the pay-as-you-go method.

The concept that each generation ought to accumulate vast national funds with which to look after its own old age is a delusion, because such funds become political targets and are likely to fail of their purpose. In giving such assistance as may be desired to the aged and infirm, it is proper for the State to operate on the pay-as-you-go plan because it has the taxing power. This is quite a different situation from that of individuals providing for old age out of their own resources, which of course can only be done by saving in an accumulation plan.

If I had a vote it also would be against H. R. 6000, and I agree with you that a study and overhauling of the existing law would be advisable. If it is your idea that actuaries would be of assistance on the proposed commission, I would refer you for suggestions to Mr. E. M. McConney, president, Society of Actuaries. The headquarters of the society are at 208 South LaSalle Street, Chicago, Ill., but Mr. McConney also is president of the Bankers Life Co., Des Moines 7, Iowa, and would ordinarily be reached at the latter address.

A number of actuaries have been actively associated with the social-security development. Mr. M. A. Linton, president, Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia 39, Pa., has been in close association from the start. Mr. R. A. Hohaus, actuary, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., New York 10, N. Y., has been in close contact for many years. Mr. W. Rulon Williamson, 3400 Fairhill Drive, Washington 20, D. C., has also had a good deal of contact and in the past has been actuarial consultant of the Social Security Board.

It will of course be understood that the expressions herein are my personal views only.

Yours truly,

ELGIN G. FASSEL.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I may say that a number of the replies which I have received urged that I consult Mr. Linton, Mr. Williamson, and Mr. Hohaus. I have done so. No reply has yet come to me from Mr. Hohaus, but I have letters both from Mr. Williamson and Mr. Linton. They are more than interesting; they are in complete contradiction.

I am going to read them.

Mr. Linton is president of the Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co. of Philaphia. He was an actuarial consultant to the Economic Advisory Committee back in 1934 and 1935. He was also a member of the advisory counsel set up by the Senate Finance Committee during the Eightieth Congress as a result of the passage of Senate Resolution 141.

Mr. Williamson was for 20 years an actuary with the Travelers Insurance Co. of Hartford and, thereafter, from 1936 until his resignation in 1947, was actuarial consultant first to the Social Security Board and then the Social Security Administration. He is presently an actuarial consultant in private practice here in Washington.

Mr. President, in order not further to consume the time of the Senate I ask unanimous consent that the letters received by the junior Senator from Washington from Mr. Linton and from Mr. Williamson be made a part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HON. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Committee on Public Works,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Thank you for your letter of May 31 about H. R. 6000. I am strongly in favor of enacting the bill as reported by the Senate Finance Committee. Then, next year study can be made of extending it to cover the present retired aged. If that extension could be made we could then have a program which would provide benefits reasonably related to the workers' economic status prior to retirement, and supported by the kind of tax which has been accepted by the country, and which would continue to be accepted, I believe, because the relationship between the taxes and the level benefits would be so close.

Sincerely yours,

M. A. LINTON.

COMMISSION OF EXPERTS ON SOCIAL SECURITY

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I find myself very largely in agreement with the position you take in your letter of May 24 and I should like to deal with certain aspects in this reply. There has been an increasing recognition of the "wrong start" represented by the deferred benefit system. Among the objectives, then, of a Commission of competent informed thinkers, the most important at the outset seems to me a study of the objectives proper in the United States of America in a national program of shared provision of some portion of the very personal responsibilities represented in programs of social security.

I am giving a paper before the Health and Accident Underwriters Conference in New York City on Monday, June 5, and in dealing with the subject I outline rather dogmatically certain conclusions I have reached. I am enclosing a copy of that discussion. The Commission should seriously analyze purposes, philosophy, program, and performance for the United States of America. The prime question is: "What are we trying to do, and what should we try to do?" The Commission should start with the American uniqueness—the economic conditions and environment of freedom. Since the report of the original Committee on Economic Security of 1934 and 1935, the Advisory Councils of 1937–38 and 1948, there has been a steady and an obvious avoidance of facing any full consideration of the subject. There has been rather every effort to avoid opening up the consideration of a full program for all the citizens—at least it seems that way to an unprejudiced observer.

This study requires persons with a comprehension of demography, actuarial science as handled in private insurance—the better to avoid the deferments and the individual equities of such protection—the law, business economics and finance, business, and public research. Congressman CURTIS says that competent men should be engaged who can put consecutive time for many months on canvassing the situation, and setting down the results of their studies. They should be free of the domination from the Social Security Administration or political expediency. Such men exist, and they should be found. They must be mature, competent, honest, patriotic. As my paper for June 5 sets forth, I believe the insurance designation a misleading one, and I suggest calling the proper program social budgeting to bring in the sense of financial responsibility in budgeting, and to sidetrack the oppressive bargains for all appeal in the current OASI program.

I shall perhaps add a second letter later, but in this one I want to discuss the problem of costs which is so much the province of the actuary. A paper of mine on cost factors appeared in a social-security bulletin while I was actuarial consultant for the Social Security Board—in 1938. In 1947 after I had left the Social Security Administration, there appeared Actuarial Study Number 21, written by Mr. L. O. Shudde, still with the Office of the Actuary—Social Security Administration—and by George Immerwahr, then with the Actuarial Section of the Analysis Division of the Bureau of Old Age and Survivors, now with the Monumental Life of Baltimore. The purpose of both reports was to make clear the wide range present in these cost factors and the essential unpredictability of costs over time in such a program as old-age and survivors insurance. This is so fundamental an item that in spite of careful disclaimers as to the prophetic power in the actuarial section of Senate Report No. 1669, just off the press, the avoidance of certain important items tends to create misapprehension. Thus while table 12 indicates low and high costs at the end of the century respectively of eight and one-half billion and thirteen and one-fifth billion, on the assumption of no wage advance, optimists talk of 4 percent a year and pessimists perhaps 1 percent or 2 percent a year. Most administration discussion assumes at least double the wages—and through another application—or maybe half a dozen—of today's new start, it would be more rational in the expanding planned economy to expect twenty-five billion or forty billion as the annual costs at the century's end.

The population of that time aged 65 and over—see table 7—could be 19,000,000, or it could be 29,000,000. The census has recently corrected upward the figure for 1950 to a higher point than that used in the projections, and another correction may well occur from the 1950 enumeration. Table 9 shows a low of 13,000,000 old-age beneficiaries and a high of 20,000,000—but with gerontological maintenance of work to advanced ages, and the threat of great extension of life at those high ages and earlier retirement, the range could be much wider. Ten million to thirty million might be logical. If we had only $600 a year at the lower end as benefits and $2,000 a year at higher assumption, there is a range of from $6,000,000,000 to $60,000,000,000 as the benefits range way out there. Dollar costs have no definiteness off there in the future, but last year the outlay of two-thirds of a billion is about 1 percent of that top figure in the future. Percentage costs hide a lot more vagaries, but nothing can hide the speculation which is possible. The level-premium costs have an apparent definiteness that does not bring out sufficiently the fact that there is no expectation of collecting such sums in advance, and earning the interest on them. They do not bring out the fact clearly enough that table 19 can occur many times before 2000, but that in the years when the benefits have piled up to tremendous proportions an outgo of 50 percent more than the income could really be serious. Such guides seem to me about like a New York street sign, floating on an errant flying Dutchman in the Sargasso Seas.

Through the 15 years since the act of 1935 went through, we have had pious warnings at each yearly interval that benefits were indeterminate and that it would be well to collect more money. But always as to the current time when we could know barely what current requirements might be, OASI has neglected them and has centered attention on the remote future when we could not know. It has seemed a strangely inverted concern, but we have been very sure that current outlay would not be large. This report, however, seems to open up a route of easy qualification, only six quarters of covered employment, with as little as $300 earnings from employment, or as little as $600 earnings from self-employment—and perhaps affecting six to eight million persons in the next 5 years. Whether we regard it as a racket or not, it has all the earmarks, but it brings down to the current situation the indeterminateness that affected the distant future heretofore. We might qualify only 1,000,000; we might qualify 6; we might have the minimum of $25 or even $20 a month for most, or we might have a minimum wage of 75 cents an hour—or at the rate of $125 a month—to give over $50 a month in benefits. So now we have indeterminate costs almost at once, as well as in the distant future.

We run into the values of the sociologists—the assessments made by American citizens of these devious folk ways so untried and so fundamentally unattractive to responsible citizens. How measure the persistence of integrity, the power of the dollar of benefits for a penny of contributions—or less?

Public assistance has been the leading source of benefits to the aged and the dependent children—three times the payments last year that were handled through OASI. This is a very interesting fact, that virtually no forecast is made for the major plan, while these serious studies have been developed for the minor one.

There are in fact four categories of the aged: 1, the recipients of OASI benefits; 2, the recipients of old-age assistance and aid to dependent children; 3, the recipients of both; and 4, the recipients of neither. The third category is one of major importance hereafter, since the new bill calls attention to the convenience of collecting from both sources, by limiting the Federal grant to the States to $25 instead of $30 available for the recipients of two alone.

In short we have undependability both now and later under the recommendations of the Senate Finance Committee, and I have gone to this trouble to show how badly needed is the financial responsibility of men of the right type in this Commission. There is internal evidence that the actuary is trying to tell his story in this report, but that he has not been free to bring out the long-run hazards sufficiently. The type of "open-end" program was that of the assessment and fraternal insurances of the 1870's and 1880's, which have been so unsatisfactory over the years for the relatively small groups which they involved. Large numbers of life actuaries regard this OASI as inherently of the same danger, but the area of operation multiplied a hundredfold.

Financial irresponsibility seems to me to characterize this program, but if the benefits to the existent aged are now dangled before the eyes of these old people and the qualifications are as few as set forth in this report, I expect that current unhappiness can be more serious in the next few years than a long-delayed nemesis.

I have covered much of this, with extreme brevity, in some of my testimony before the Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee. This should not be just a debate, a showing up of flaws, though the flaws should be examined. It should be the sort of analysis that the British used to call a "Royal Commission." It should get the outside opinion, so carefully avoided by the last advisory council, and it should integrate much available data both within the Federal Government and outside.

The magnitude of the present OASI and Public Assistance Benefits would permit adjustment now. The difficulty of adjustment would be many times harder, should H. R. 6000 be enacted first. Next to the value of the Commission is blocking H. R. 6000, with its contradictory principles, and its unpredictable costs.

I am tremendously impressed with the objectivity of your letter, and with the importance of your resolution. If I can be of any help to you, either as an actuary or as a citizen, please feel free to call upon me.

Yours sincerely,

W. RULON WILLIAMSON,
Actuary.

SOCIAL SECURITY COMMISSION

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I wrote you yesterday to bring out one fundamental point in connection with OASI—its unpredictability of costs, and the danger that this unpredictability will be glossed over by such expedients as level premium costs, the use of percentage of pay roll costs and the absence of any really critical examination of these matters.

Today I wish to discuss very briefly too, the unsuitability of the use of employment and unemployment as a basis for our Federal program of national sharing. It seems to me that the goal should be a program for all the citizens, so that for the aged we treat the two sexes equitably. In Report No. 1669, there is a little table on page 36, which shows that by 1970—20 years from now, only 66 to 75 percent of the persons aged 65 and over will be fully insured among the males, and only 13 to 19 percent among the females. That is—20 years from now the major part of the population will still not be provided for directly.

Today only 8 to 10 percent of the aged widows of 65 and over are drawing benefits from OASI. Since on the whole formal employment is uncommon for women from 40 onwards, the gearing of major dependence upon employment records is not the way to grant benefits to such persons. The substitute of using the employment of the husband and giving 50 percent of the husband's benefits, of 75 percent of the former husband's benefits, for wives and widows respectively is a method of discriminating against women.

Steadily the administrators of social security have been bringing evidence to show that relating benefits to past records of wages has been unsatisfactory—requiring a doubling of benefits—though not handled that simply—for the retired groups and the group to be retired later—and by implication correcting for the clumsiness whenever the shoe pinches later.

The system does not fit the presumptive needs of women, it does not fit the presumptive needs of men—as natural changes take place in the economy. It does not even insure the majority of our older people for 20 years.

We do not handle sufficient data to show what the assets and incomes presumably are for the existing older persons. We need such a comprehensive review as to the status of the American citizens today—quite different than it was in the sad days of the depression, and absolutely different than it was implied to be, when all married women were regarded as dependents—essentially penniless—without regard to the earnings or property of the spouse.

So a major objective of the Commission's work is factual analysis not yet really attempted.

Sincerely,

W. RULON WILLIAMSON.

Mr. CAIN. Having offered these two letters, both from persons who have had intimate contact with social-security affairs, I want to offer two others from persons who in different ways have seen at close range exactly how our present social-security system operates.

The first of these next letters is from Mr. Jay Iglauer, vice president and treasurer of Halle Bros. department store in Cleveland. Mr. Iglauer was a member of the special committee appointed in 1937–38 to study the Social Security Act. If I am not mistaken, the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] was also a member of that committee, and I would draw Mr. Iglauer's letter to the attention of the junior Senator from Illinois.

The second of these letters is from George Immerwahr, now a consulting actuary, of Baltimore, but formerly chief actuary of the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors' Insurance in the Social Security Administration.

Again, Mr. President, in an effort to save time, and because I know the letters probably will be read by my colleagues, I ask unanimous consent that both of them be made a part of my remarks at this time.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HALLE BROS. CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio, May 17, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I have seldom seen a position regarding the social-security problem which is so accurately in accord with my own views, as your letter of May 12.

H. R. 6000 is an illustration of the dangers inherent upon embarking on any long-term program such as social security without a full realization of the ultimate consequences.

When Congress established the first social-security law it created the impression that the employer and the employee jointly, with some small assistance from the Government, were to create a fund, out of which would be paid the minimum subsistence requirements of the aged—not as a matter of charity, but as a matter of right. I hope you have followed carefully the testimony of W. R. Williamson, one of the original actuarial consultants to the Social Security Board, whose opinion I have learned to respect highly. He has come to the same conclusion as you—that the public assistance has now overshadowed the so-called insurance system of which you speak.

You may recall that I was a member of the committee appointed by joint action of the Senate and the Social Security Board to study the Social Security Act in 1937–38. Already at that time members of that committee were deeply concerned over the fact that the funds paid in by employees, and in which they had a moral vested right, were being paid into the Federal Treasury along with the employers' contributions, and that to the extent that they were not being currently used to pay benefits the remainder of the funds were being used by the Federal Government for every purpose. The answer of the political economists has been that to the extent that the Government has used these funds they did not have to borrow with bonds of the United States for other Government purposes and therefore the credit of the United States of America was thereby so much improved.

With the advent of World War II and the enormous public debt that was created as a consequence, it becomes clear that as and when the amount of benefits that were contemplated to be paid in 1960, 1970, and 1980 approached the maximum and then exceeded the collections, the Government would have to borrow or impose additional taxes to meet any underestimates or any liberalization of benefits.

The trouble with the whole program is that the accumulation of tax payments for social security in the earlier years of the system produces so-called "trust funds" so large that the temptation is constantly present to liberalize benefits and/or to increase coverage. I agree with you that a pay-as-you-go system, with minimum subsistence coverage for all, is the only answer. That, I believe, is in the main the thesis of Mr. Williamson's position too.

I am particularly glad that you have taken the position in favor of a well-organized Commission to study the whole social-security problem. Such a Commission should be composed of—

1. Representatives of the actuarial profession.
2. Representatives of the Government.
3. Representatives of business.
4. Representatives of labor.
5. Representatives of the general public.

Care should be taken that the Commission's personnel should be nonpartisan in character so far as it is possible, or at least balanced as to the principal political parties. Such a Commission might well be expected to take a full year or two to arrive at conclusions.

A word about my observations concerning the previous Social Security Commission on which I served—I was impressed with the high character, ability, and conscientious attitude of the majority of that special committee. If there was any unfavorable aspect to that committee, it was the absence from most of the committee conferences of the representatives of labor.

I believe that such a program as you envisage is the only way to approach the problem that bids fair to have such serious consequences to the whole economy. I believe also that such a proposal would meet with the support of every right-thinking organization concerned with these problems.

With your permission I am sending a copy of your letter to the chairman of the Social Security Committee of the National Retail Dry Goods Association and the Social Security Committee of the American Retail Federation, and I shall ask them to give support to your proposal.

I shall await your reply with interest.

Sincerely yours,

JAY IGLAUER,
Vice President and Treasurer.

BALTIMORE, MD., June 12, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Though there have been some other national issues in which I have not been in accord with your views, I must say that I am most definitely in accord with those expressed in your letter of May 25, 1950, relating to the proposed social security bill, H. R. 6000. I am convinced that to extend the defects of our present social security law as H. R. 6000 does would be most unfortunate, and that what is needed is a thorough, independent study which will go back to fundamentals and reconstruct our social security system from scratch.

As you probably know, I served on the actuarial staff of the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance in the Social Security Administration for 7 years, ultimately becoming the chief actuary for the Bureau. When I began this work I was most enthusiastic over the social security program as it was then conceived. After some years in this work, however, I came to the recognition that this program was not working out as had been contemplated and that its defects were so serious and so fundamental that it could not work out effectively without complete revision, and this recognition was one of the factors that led me, late in 1946, to leave the Social Security Administration and enter another Government agency. And even more impelling factor was my realization that Social Security Commissioner Altmeyer and some of my other superiors, who in my opinion must have been as well aware of most of these basic defects as I was, nevertheless apparently lacked the intellectual honesty needed to come to an open admission of these defects and to seek their elimination, but instead chose to temporize with what they knew to be defective, to cover up one mistake with another, to divert the public's attention from the real defects of the social security program and instead to blame the program's failure on factors of a much less pertinent nature. It seemed to me, also, that there were various ulterior motives which I shall describe later. So long as this attitude and these motives prevailed among the officials of the Social Security Administration, it seemed useless for me to remain there.

I will not give here a full story of what I consider to be the defects of the social security program and the proposed patching-up legislation, nor shall I spell out my recommendations for correcting the program. Because I was an employee of the Bureau of Internal Revenue at the time of the House and Senate hearings on social security, I could not testify personally at their hearings. However, an address which I prepared for a local actuarial club was inserted in the Senate hearings by another club member and appears on pages 1979–1987 of the hearings, and this address indicates my views. In many respects they are quite similar to the views indicated in your letter. I oppose the present system and the proposed legislation on the grounds that it excludes from benefits the great majority of today's old people (and would still exclude them despite extension of coverage among people still working), that the major cash costs of the system are deferred to such an extent that the costs actually accruing are concealed beyond any possible public recognition, that no adequate financing method can be developed for such a system, that the benefit formula, under which benefit amounts are more or less proportionate to previous income, gives rise to a socially incorrect and wasteful distribution of the funds available for social security purposes, and that the basing of benefits on wage and payroll records is needlessly complex in its administration. Like yourself, I favor a system in which Federal benefits would be available to all in certain categories; for example, to all those aboye a specified age. Benefit amounts would in general be uniform, but they might be tapered down for beneficiaries above a certain income level; if so, such tapering down would be based on taxable income (as shown in the beneficiary's tax return) but not on a needs test. The Federal Government would no longer subsidize public assistance. Federal benefits would be financed out of an earmarked addition to Federal income tax.

WHAT EVERY SENATOR AND CONGRESSMAN SHOULD KNOW

What seems most important for me to pass on to you now is some vital but little-known information concerning the Social Security Administration, its motives in sponsoring legislation, and its tactics in furthering its aims. These must be appreciated if a proper course of action is to be taken.

First, there is a definite desire on the part of the Social Security Administration to convey to the public the idea that social-security benefits—that is, old-age and survivor pension benefits furnished through the social-security system—are far more inexpensive than the same benefits furnished in any other way. A deferred-benefit system, in which benefits are denied a large proportion of the old, the survivors and the disabled of the present but generous promises are made to those who will be old, survivors, or disabled in the future, plays right into the hands of this desire. Because the number of beneficiaries under such a system in its early years is a very small proportion—say one-eighth or one-tenth—of the ultimate number, such a system appears to be cheap even though a large actuarial cost is accruing, and it is easy to promise benefits at an ever-increasing level without the public realizing the cost to which it is ultimately committed. The proposed method of financing the benefits of H. R. 6000 by employer and employee contributions which rise from 1½ percent to 3¼ percent by a series of scheduled increases is entirely unrealistic. All experience to date indicates that the increases will not place as scheduled unless either future disbursements rise faster than predicted or benefit increases are promised with the contribution increases—and either of these conditions would render the scheduled increases insufficient to make the system self-supporting.

The contribution increases which had been scheduled for the existing benefit law did not take place as scheduled, so that today's contributions fall considerably short of indicating the true cost of the system. Social Security Commissioner Altmeyer will tell you that the blame is on Congress, that he favors an actuarially balanced system, but he knows that an actuarially balanced system is a political impossibility if scheduled contribution increases are to be relied upon. If he were really sincere about an actuarial balance for the system, he would insist on the full level premium rate being assessed from the start. But this would give the public pause about the cost of the system. Similarly, in a true pay-as-you-go system of the type both you and I advocate, the system's real costs would be immediately apparent, and this too is a situation the Social Security Commissioner could not tolerate.

Mr. Altmeyer will tell you that at various times during the war years he resisted the freezing of the employer and employee tax rates at 1 percent on the ground that this was well below the level actuarial cost of the existing program. Yet at the same time, he did nothing to discourage the hopes of labor groups who were supporting a tax increase in the belief that the increase would lead to higher benefits. In the Social Security Administration we played a double game; we told Congress that the tax rates were too low for the existing scale of benefits, yet we told covered workers that they were "paying for their benefits." We talked of the system as if it were contributory, yet the employee taxes represented such a small proportion of true cost that the system could not really be called contributory in any true sense. But the public deception went on and still goes on; in fact I recall one time when I was told by Commissioner Altmeyer's office to refer to the employee taxes not merely as contributions but instead as "premiums," to convey even more emphatically the erroneous idea that the worker pays the cost of his benefits.

Second, the Social Security Administration wishes that its system be looked to as the source of the major portion of income for retired persons and survivors and not merely the source of a subsistence benefit on which the worker or beneficiary can fall back if all else fails. If a man who has been earning $5,000 a year writes in to the Administration and complains that his $45-a-month benefit is far insufficient to maintain him after retirement in the manner to which he is accustomed, I think you and I would agree that the correct answer to the man would be that after earning $5,000 a year for some years, he should have laid aside for himself a substantial additional amount in the form of insurance and savings, perhaps in an owned home. We would tell him that because the cost of social insurance benefits is substantial, before his benefit was raised, our first effort should be to make sure that a benefit providing at least subsistence should be made available to his less fortunate fellow who had been earning only $1,200 or $1,500 a year and who, therefore, had probably been unable to lay aside for his old age. We would tell him that the differential between his employee taxes and those paid by the $1,200-a-year man paid for a differential in benefit of only $2 a month, whereas he was already getting a differential in benefit over the lower-paid man far above that figure, and that actually it was not the responsibility of the Government of the United States to give him a benefit much higher than that of the low-paid man merely because he enjoyed a higher standard of living already.

But the Social Security Administration officials would send him an altogether different answer. They would agree with him that his benefit is much too small, despite the fact he had already had an income well above that of the average-paid worker and should have been able to make considerable provision for himself. They would stress the fact that they had repeatedly urged Congress to liberalize benefits like his. It is of interest to note that in the social-security bill which it advocated, H. R. 2893, the monthly benefit of a man who has earned $4,800 or more a year since 1937 would have been increased by about $50, while that of the man who has earned $50 a month would have been increased by less than $6, despite the fact that it is the latter man whose benefit under the present law is so pitifully small and for whom a benefit increase is so desperately needed.

Third, the Social Security Administration stresses the payroll tax method of financing social security even though it knows that this method is unsatisfactory in theory and in practice and can never be extended to cover 100 percent of gainful work in this country. This method, which involves employee taxes withheld by employers and matched by employer taxes, seems to work out conveniently for the presently covered employment groups, though even here are various administrative difficulties on the part of both Government and employers that are not generally realized. But to extend this method to the myriad borderline forms of employment, the casual earnings, the small earnings of marginal self-employed persons is a process which can be attempted only with a great degree of trouble and never will be perfected. Even for the partial extension of payroll tax coverage contemplated in H. R. 6000 we find numerous difficulties of definition and enforcement, a disproportionately increased administrative expense, and the quite intenable formula of taxing the self-employed by one and one-half times the employee rate.

Since social security is really a charge on the country as a whole, why not recognize it as such and finance it by adding an earmarked tax to our existing individual income-tax system? The machinery for this system has already been developed; it covers income earners of all types, whether employer or employee, farmer or factory worker or investment holder, and it leaves out the trifling amounts of income (those under $600 a year) which it is a nuisance to tax for social-security purposes or otherwise.

The reason for rejecting this ready-made and suitable form of taxation in favor of the inappropriate employment tax structure and the mammoth system of wage records is that of implementing the impression that this social-security program is a contributory program, and second, that the employer pays part of the cost. The error of the first of these impressions I have already pointed out. The second impression, that the employer pays part of the cost is also erroneous, in that the employer tax is largely passed on to the consumer; that is, to the general public. Nevertheless this employer-bears-the-cost argument is one which has been continually used by the Social Security Administration in order to get the support of labor groups and others. The idea is to make labor think the other fellow pays.

Fourth, the incomplete job coverage, inevitable under the payroll-tax method, forms a very convenient scapegoat on which the Social Security Administration can place the major blame for the social-security program's shortcomings. When asked by the Senate Finance Committee why only 2,000,000 out of 11,000,000 people over 65 are receiving benefits, Commissioner Altmeyer answered: "Exactly, and why is that? Because we did not start a system with universal coverage. I hate to remind you but the Committee on Economic Security did recommend universal coverage in 1935, just as we are recommending it today." Mr. Altmeyer knows that the major reason for the small proportion of beneficiaries among the present aged is the more fundamental defect that people already too old on January 1, 1937, to work on and after that date could not become beneficiaries under any job-coverage definition, and even if his own bill, H. R. 2893, had been law since 1937, over 6,000,000 of today's 9,000,000 nonbeneficiaries would still be nonbeneficiaries, but this device of blaming the trouble all on incomplete job coverage seems to have worked wonders for him. Even the normally astute Prof. Sumner Slichter was taken in by this deception, as is indicated in his prepared statement to the Finance Committee (see p. 2128 of the recent Senate hearings).

Even the estimates in the committee report on H. R. 6000 show that extension of job coverage will pay only a limited number of today's older people on the benefit rolls, and it should be remembered that those who do come on the rolls are either those who are still working or some others who are in a position and of a nature to work the system by getting a few extra "quarters of coverage" for themselves. Those who are now off the benefit rolls and are no longer working and who are too honest to work the system in this way will remain off the benefit rolls.

Even at that, I believe the estimates of number of beneficiaries in 1955 are too high. I am not aware of what pressures the present Social Security Administration actuaries work under, but I know that during my years as an actuary for that organization there was a decided pressure exerted to produce high estimates of the number of beneficiaries in the immediately ensuing years. This was partly to create a good impression of the effectiveness of the system and partly to assure a safely padded administrative budget for the organization. I recall, for example, how on one occasion I had worked out estimates covering, I believe, a 2-year period and submitted a detailed statement in support of them. Mr. John J. Corson, then Director of the Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance, sent the estimates back to me with various changes of his own penciled in, raising the estimates by probably 50 or 75 percent, and directed me to work out a justification of these revised estimates of his. This, of course, I had to do, though I was convinced of the greater accuracy of my original estimates, and it subsequently turned out that even my original estimates were too high. Some of the published actuarial estimates in connection with the 1939 legislation were several times too high; for example, it was estimated that the number of retired workers who would receive benefits in the middle of 1945 would be from a low of 1,217,000 to a high of 1,854,000, but the actual figure turned out to be only 431,000.

Fifth, the Social Security Administration officials will tell you that they prefer contributory social insurance to public assistance. They know, however, that passage of H. R. 6000 will transfer practically none of the present assistance recipients to the insurance benefit rolls and that despite the passage of H. R. 6000 the assistance rolls will probably grow for some years to come. The passage of a really effective social-security program, under which the current aged and the current survivors would be brought on the rolls to receive automatic benefits—that is, without a needs test—would make it appropriate for the Federal Government to withdraw completely from the assistance field, but nothing could be more distasteful to the Social Security Administration officials than this.

The two reasons for their preference of the perpetuation of this dual system of insurance and assistance are these: First, through participation in the State programs of public assistance the Social Security Administration officials are enjoying an increasing influence in State welfare administration, and, second, they are able to pit insurance recipients and assistance recipients in competition with each other for increasing benefit levels. It is a form of competition which has played beautifully into their hands thus far, and why throw away a device like this.

Sixth, vested interests in the existing form of program have been well developed. The Social Security Administration has encouraged covered workers to believe that they have paid for the benefits promised them and in this way a resistance on the workers' part has been built up against any change in the form of the program. But even more unfortunate is the vested interest of the Social Security Administration itself. Naturally it has the usual vested interest of a bureaucracy in its jobs, but even more, it is concerned about the perpetuation of the techniques and the philosophy it has built up. The wage-record system, for all the mechanical techniques and skill which have gone into its making, has become such a mammoth thing that any curtailment of it is unthinkable to the Administration. I recall the reaction I got to a proposal I made for a less steeply graded benefit scale, a proposal which I argued on the basis of both social desirability and actuarial equity. Other officials protested that if we adopted such a proposal, we might become unable to justify the wage-record system. Truly this system has become not a means to an end but an end in itself.

THE NEED FOR A STUDY COMMISSION

The most unfortunate thing the Senate could do would be to pass H. R. 6000 on the supposition that it would investigate its shortcomings later. Obviously, if it approves the bill, it will not hurry to take up a study of it later. But more important is the fact that the passage of this bill now would make it much more difficult and costly to develop an effective bill later. As it is politically next to impossible to lower benefits, if the Senate desires now to go to a uniform benefit system, it can do so now by setting the uniform benefit at about $45 a month, but if now this bill is passed and then a uniform benefit is decided upon, the benefit level will have to be much higher.

It is safe to say that no really independent study of this subject has been made since the enactment of social security. There are those who will claim that the Senate Finance Committee's advisory council which studied the subject in 1948 was independent. The men and women who served on this council were big-name persons who were extremely busy in their own fields and could not devote the time necessary for extended original study of this subject. As the result, the study staff, whose members were recommended by the Social Security Administration, did the real work. The data which the staff members provided for the council members were those which the Social Security Administration wanted them to see, and I have ascertained from some of the council members that various other facts which might have led to different results were never brought to their attention. There were independent qualified people who sought to serve on the staff and who later sought to come before the council meetings, but who were denied that opportunity. Social Security Commissioner Altmeyer was the only "outsider" permitted to come before the council with an expression of his views.

You ask me in your letter how an appropriate study commission should be formed, and, as I have already indicated, I feel it should include persons who are proficient students, drawn from a variety of fields, persons who can approach the subject without pride of sharing authorship in the existing system, and persons who can devote extended full time to do original work.

Once the commission is formed, it is essential that it admit for expression of viewpoint any person who can demonstrate close association with the field of social security, including those who wish to appear "off the record." If the commission is permitted to see only officially sanctioned data and to hear only officially stated views, as was the case with the 1948 advisory council, the whole project is wasted. I should propose that Government employees who have had experience with this program should be permitted to appear, with their presence and views held confidential. Some very interesting and valuable testimony could, in fact, be furnished by some present social-security employees whom I know, if this protection were granted them. Persons who appear off the record usually have a more genuine interest than many of the witnesses who appear at a congressional committee hearing, many of whom express views that are not their own and are given merely for the record.

I cannot tell you emphatically enough how necessary it is to have a study of this sort before any bill is enacted, and I sincerely wish you success in your efforts to achieve this end.

Yours very truly,

GEORGE E. IMMERWAHR.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, in conclusion, I have two groups of letters before me. The first group consists of six letters. Each one of them is from a different type of organization, person or group in this country. One of the letters is from the International Association of Accident and Health Underwriters. The second letter is from the Occidental Life Insurance Co. The third letter comes from the board of pensions of the Methodist Church. The fourth letter is from the Insurance Economics Society of America. The fifth letter is from Mr. A. R. Findley, who is serving as chairman of the social security committee of the National Retail Dry Goods Association. The sixth letter is from an actuary of an insurance company, which touches on the necessity of a study by a disinterested technical staff.

Because I think such letters are of real and positive interest to all Members of the Senate, I ask unanimous consent, sir, that I may be permitted to insert them in the RECORD as part of my remarks at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF ACCIDENT AND HEALTH UNDERWRITERS,
Chicago, Ill., May 19, 1950.

The Honorable HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is in reply to your letter of May 12. May I commend your unwillingness to vote favorably for H. R. 6000 as it is expected to be reported to the Senate by the Senate Finance Committee, and your preference for a resolution that the social security establishment be left as it is, pending a thorough and completely independent investigation of its purpose, present status and future development.

May I suggest that your resolution contain three major provisions:

1. H. R. 6000 should be deferred pending an independent study of the philosophy of social budgeting and its dominant characteristics as contrasted to the present system of OASI and public assistance. This should constitute, in essence, the mandamus to the investigatory group.

2. The personnel of this investigatory body should exclude any present employee of the Social Security Administration or the Federal Security Agency, because, in all likelihood, such an individual would be predisposed to recommend, prejudicially, a continuation and expansion of the present system. I would recommend that the following people be named to the investigatory group: Mr. W. Rulon Williamson, a Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Alfred Guertin, the latter a staff member of the American Life Convention.

3. The method of study should be independent, fair and impartial; should allow at least one year's time to prepare a report, and should utilize and accept opinions, offered by conference method, from leaders in government, business and labor. Leaders in agricultural and consumer groups should also be consulted.

My personal opinion is that our present system should be scrapped entirely and substituted with a system of social budgeting (national sharing), providing a floor of protection for the incidence of catastrophic contingencies. This system should provide universality, current rather than deferred protection, and broad social equity rather than individual equity. The system should allow contributions from all active citizens both employed and recipients of investment income. The system should not provide progressive taxation but rather earmarked taxes, probably as a part of the wage-withholding plan. The needs test should be avoided. There should be no disqualifications because of former intelligent thrift. The social budgeting system should eliminate the demoralization and awkwardness of present public-assistance programs. I agree with you that it should be the purpose of the investigatory commission to recommend the age at which benefits should become receivable and should indicate the size of benefits to provide the floor for subsistence. I am wholeheartedly in favor of an earmarked tax to make each individual citizen conscious of what he is paying. Such a system will, by means of an informed electorate, prevent future indiscriminate increases.

At your request, the above suggestions have been prepared hurriedly and only in skeletal fashion. I hope that my views may be of assistance to you.

Very sincerely yours,
WESLEY J. A. JONES.

OCCIDENTAL LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Raleigh, N. C., May 19, 1950.

The Honorable HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It is certainly heartening to read a letter such as you wrote me on May 17 indicating such sound views on our social-security bill which is now before the Senate. It so happens that within the last 2 weeks I was requested to write a note about our social-security plan that could be understood by laymen.

I have been out of town most of the time and have written such a note rather hurriedly, but I am pleased to enclose a copy.

You will note that many of the ideas set forth therein are similar to those stated in your letter. I am thoroughly in accord with your statement that patching up unworkable social-security programs is bound to produce more maladjustments than cures. We have had studies and commissions, but probably the personnel, although capable, did not have the time and independence that were necessary.

I think you will find that educators tend to be too idealistic, lawyers are legalistic, and professional economists become too involved in theories. In 1935 I was with the Treasury Department for about 3 months working entirely on social security tax questions: At that time there was a substantial difference of opinion among actuaries. It was interesting that 15 years later actuarial opinion was almost unanimous.

As a profession we are notoriously poor politicians, but perhaps some progress is being made. Your letter is one indication.

The commission, if it should be appointed, should not be composed of representatives of certain groups such as labor, business, insurance, or the security-board bureaucracy. Actuaries are practically never wealthy enough to have much of a stock interest in insurance and are usually independent thinkers. The commission should be heavily weighted with Members of the Congress and with actuaries who have been studying the development of the social-security plan for many years. It is unfortunate that we have followed the European ideas rather than some of the better thought that has come from our Latin-American friends. One of the soundest books that has been written on this subject is in Spanish by Mr. Walter Dittell in Guatemala.

Since time is the essence I have written this hurriedly promptly upon receipt of your letter, but would be glad to hear from you at any further time if I can be of any assistance.

Yours very sincerely,
J. M. WOOLERY,
Vice President-Actuary.

A democratic society must provide some orderly machinery for providing protection against inability of individuals to attain their own security. Before living became so complicated it was possible for the aged to do odd jobs around the farm, to help with the children, and to perhaps help with sewing and such small jobs. There were not the small homes with no extra rooms for the old people, and work was carried on without the specialization that has now come to be widespread.

There should not be any conflict or confusion between proper social security and the exercise of personal industry and thrift. Social security should represent the protection, the floor of subsistence to replace reliance upon charity and public relief. It should not prevent the individual from having the right and opportunity to raise himself to such level of security as his industry and thrift dictate. If social-security benefits are ever made acceptable as a standard of security, the will to work will be weakened and destroyed.

In 1935 the first Federal Social Security Act was passed providing monthly benefits for retired employees which was amended in 1939 to provide benefits for certain specific dependents. It was recognized that it would be a long time before the so-called old-age and survivorship insurance would adequately provide for aged. To supplement the old-age benefits, so-called assistance was also provided which was to be financed jointly by the States and the Federal Government. The old-age and survivorship insurance is all Federal. The old-age assistance is operated by the States with widely varying rules for receiving such assistance. Each State decides how much property or other resources those at age may have. The Federal Government contributes one-half of whatever the State pays each person. This, of course, has resulted in some States having much larger portion of their aged people receiving such benefits varying from about 13 percent in Ohio to nearly 90 percent in Louisiana. It has also resulted in the wealthier States receiving more assistance from the Government, since they match the number of dollars that the States pay out.

At the present time there are less than 2,000,000 receiving old-age insurance benefits for which they paid something and nearly 3,000,000 are receiving old-age assistance for which they paid nothing. The average old-age benefits are nearly twice what is received under the insurance benefits. It is hardly fair to pay twice as much to the ones who have contributed nothing.

House bill 6000 is now before the Senate. Under the present bill about 35 percent of the men and 5 percent of the women over age 65 are covered. Twenty years from now under the present bill, about 55 percent of the men and 12 percent of the women will be covered. Under H. R. 6000, which is the new bill now under consideration, 20 years from now approximately 70 percent of the men and 15 percent of the women will be covered. It is obvious from these few figures that both the present bill and the suggested one are far from adequate to the problem of our aged people. Government security plans cannot operate as private insurance companies do and build up reserves to take care of future benefits. Each generation of working people must take care of their own old people; that is, the ones who are now currently dependent, just as they must take care of those who are now children and not old enough to work. To promise large benefits payable in dollars years from now, means nothing unless we know what those dollars will purchase. Our standard of living will depend upon production, and the standard of living 50 years from now will also depend upon production 50 years from now regardless of whether the average income is $2,000 or $20,000 a year. Everyone knows that it takes $2 now to do what $1 would do 10 years ago.

The present old-age security plan is discriminatory in favor of those who have more. The honest and thrifty farmer, small-business man, and school teacher receive nothing from our present social security unless they are willing to draw old-age assistance which is based on pauperism. The man who has drawn $3,000 a year and over for a few years and has recently reached age 65 is the one who is receiving the windfall of benefits amounting to about 10 times the value of what he paid in.

In addition to old-age insurance and old-age assistance, the third Federal recognition of the aged exists in a $6,000 income-tax exemption over age 65. This benefits obviously the well-to-do, and the higher in the income-tax bracket the more is the benefit.

The whole question of social security should be referred to a commission of experts who have made a study of such plans with the idea of solving the problem that now exists instead of promising large benefits for political purposes for working people when they retire years hence and which may or may not, most likely not, be sufficient to provide any reasonable living standard. The current tax collections which are made from the laboring people are sufficient to provide a floor of protection on the subsistence level to everyone who is presumptively in need. There should be no necessity of concealing small savings or of pretending to be a pauper in order to collect benefits. Presumptive need might be those who are 70 and over, those between 65 and 70 who are not employed, and those between 60 and 65 who are invalids or unable to work.

The present plan discriminates greatly against women and children. It discriminates against the workingman in the small income-tax brackets in favor of the worker who makes the higher salary. It discriminates against the farmer and the small-business man. It discriminates against school teachers and State and municipal employees. The present bill is inadequate.

THE BOARD OF PENSIONS OF THE METHODIST CHURCH,
Chicago, Ill., May 23, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I have your letter of May 16 about the extension of the social-security bill (H. R. 6000) which, if I understand correctly, has been already reported out for action.

I thoroughly agree with you that the whole social-security program needs revamping in the interest of national security. Wholesale adventures in socialism (which seems to be the political passion of the moment), can involve us in a vast mass of practically invisible contingent liabilities that can in a few years outrun the published Federal indebtedness.

Careful restudy of this fundamentally important concern of the Nation is a must item.

Knowing something of the results of far-reaching social-security schemes in Australia, Great Britain, and elsewhere, I am much inclined to think that we could go on the rocks just as hard as they have, unless we take counsel with wise actuaries who are capable of taking an unbiased view of the total picture. A commission like that recently headed by ex-President Hoover would seem to be in order.

A pay-as-you-go system would be much more realistic and hard-headed than the present procedure. Those who work for wages should bear the current cost of a basic pension for all who cannot any longer work. On that basis, every family would be brought to realize that the wage earners and not Santa Claus are the real carriers of this social responsibility. The idea that it can be cared for painlessly is bunk.

Your thoughts on this subject, as expressed in your letter, are quite in line with mine.

Cordially yours,
THOMAS A. STAFFORD,
Executive Secretary.

INSURANCE ECONOMICS
SOCIETY OF AMERICA,
Chicago, Ill., May 22, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I deeply appreciate the opportunity given me in your letter of May 15, 1950, to express my views relative to H. R. 6000 and I am delighted to note your reaction and your approach to the problem of old-age survivors insurance.

You are to be congratulated upon your forthright stand in this situaton and I am pleased to give you my thoughts in an attempt to solve a problem that requires an immediate solution.

We should not expand the Social Security Act now operating on a false basis until a thorough study is made of the act since its inception in 1935. What is needed is an independent commission with authority and with adequate funds to ascertain the best method for handling the problem of caring for the Nation's aged. Patching up the present law is not the answer.

I agree in your think realtive to an honest pay-as-you-go system which could be kept on a supportable basis, thereby keeping the cost of social security before the people at all times and not creating a further debt to be passed on to future generations.

The Commission which you propose should be composed of men of standing with no prior connections with the Social Security Board. In the past too many advisory councils on social security have been dominated by individuals committed to the continuation and expansion of the act.

This matter is of vital importance to our American way of life and I am delighted that you will lead the way in correcting a piece of legislation that has dangerous implications for the future of our country.

I hope you will be successful, and if I can be of any help, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Sincerely yours,
E. H. O'CONNOR,
Managing Director.

WIEBOLDT STORES, INC.,

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am so impressed with the cogency of your arguments and the conciseness, as well as the completeness, of your presentation that I am constrained to volunteer my views, even though you have not asked for them.

By way of introduction and background, I should like to state that I am now serving my fifth year as chairman of the social-security committee of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, and am also a member of the social-security committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce. I have given a great deal of study to social-security problems and, more recently, to H. R. 6000 itself and the significance of the changes proposed therein.

Quite some time ago, I arrived at the same conclusions you have so admirably set forth in your letter. In fact, at a meeting of the directors of NRDGA held last January, I argued at some length that the association should adopt these conclusions as its policy. While many of those present agreed that such a policy is the only logical conclusion, they felt that the association could not publicly take such a position without taking a poll of its members and that extended education must precede the taking of such a poll.

There is no question in my mind but that you are on the right track. I sincerely hope that the arguments of yourself and others of a like mind may prevail and that the Congress can be prevailed upon to authorize a thorough study prior to adoption of any amendments as contemplated by H. R. 6000.

May I have your permission to send copies of your letter to the members of the NRDGA social-security committee, some 20 in number? I think it would be helpful in crystallizing their thinking.

Sincerely yours,
A. RAY FINDLEY,
Vice President and Treasurer.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: My morning's mail brought letters from Mr. Williamson and from Mr. Pauley, both referring to discussions or correspondence with you about our country's social-security structure. This is just a note to express my strong agreement with the proposition that an independent commission should weigh the faults of our present structure against the desirability of the type of immediate widespread minimum coverage which has been called "pay as you go". We have had studies of our social-security system by able and disinterested men, but unfortunately the value of their studies is clouded because they did not have the services of a disinterested technical staff. I feel that one of the greatest long-range services that could be rendered to our country now would be the institution of such a study with a proper independent staff, and I hope that your efforts bear fruit.

As a matter of possible interest I am enclosing a copy of a statement submitted to the Senate Finance Committee this spring.

Yours very truly,
JARVIS FARLEY,
Secretary and Actuary.

STATEMENT ON H. R. 6000—SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENT OF 1949

(By Jarvis Farley, Wellesley, Mass.)

My name is Jarvis Farley. I am an actuary, living in Wellesley, Mass., and working in Boston. I make no claim to being an expert in social-security matters, but my work as an actuary has necessarily required me to give more thought than the average citizen to considerations of practice and of principle with which social-security legislation must deal and has given me some appreciation of the practical problems which must be encountered in connection with the complicated individual accounting structure of our present social-security law. Although I do not speak as an expert, therefore, I do have some well-formed opinions which I would like to express for your consideration.

BASIC STATEMENT

Of those opinions there are two on which I hold the strongest convictions and which run directly counter to our present laws and to this bill (H. R. 6000). One is the conviction that to postpone the full cost and full benefits of the social-security structure for a full generation is unnecessary, unsound, and dangerous. The second conviction is that the maintaining of individual accounts for persons covered under the social-security laws is unnecessary and constitutes an unjustified and wasteful expense. I urge most strongly, therefore, that your committee study those aspects of the present law fully and objectively before making any decision which would make a later correction of these faults more difficult to accomplish.

In support of these opinions it is useful to look at the reasons why our social-security laws were first adopted. Each person is exposed during his life to the possible loss of the income upon which he relies for the means of living. Workers grow old or become blind, wives are widowed, and children are orphaned, and our Congress enacted legislation with the goal of providing a minimum income for each of those conditions. Even if the present bill were enacted, however, our social-security structure would fall far short of meeting that goal, partly because the full benefits of the law have been postponed for a generation and partly because our accounting structure is so complicated that it cannot provide wage records, and therefore provides no assured benefit, for a large proportion of our population.

Why were the full benefits deferred for a generation? A part of the reason lies in the reserve concept of the original legislation. It was thought then that the ultimate cost to the participants would be reduced if there were first developed a substantial reserve whose interest earnings could bear some of the ultimate cost. Part of the reason was the principle of individual equity—the concept that the benefits to each individual should reflect in some measure his personal contributions, so that no one was to receive full benefits unless he had been taxed for his full working lifetime. And third, if we are completely honest with ourselves I think we must recognize that a part of the reason for deferring the benefits was to postpone the full cost of social security. It seemed easier to accept the cost burden when the first impact was relatively light, but the full cost could not be postponed unless the benefits were also postponed.

How valid are those reasons today?

The reserve principle has already been substantially discarded, and there is no need to repeat here the reasons why the concept of reserves, so utterly essential to private voluntary insurance, is a dangerous fiction as originally adopted prior to the 1949 amendments.

The concept of individual equity—relating benefits to contributions—undoubtedly has political attraction. Individual equity is an essential characteristic of voluntary, private insurance operations, because in our democratic and competitive world insurance policies, like any other economic serivce, will be bought only if the purchaser is satisfied that he will get his money's worth. In one sense it is a high compliment to our private insurance companies that the sound principles which they developed in their voluntary operations were considered to be necessary in the Government's operations. The entire social-security structure, however, is based upon governmental compulsion, and, therefore, is subject to different concepts and requirements from those which govern private insurance. The Government can abandon the principle of individual equity and pay every aged or blind citizen and every widow and orphan today at a uniform benefit rate. Today's beneficiaries would have paid much less over the years than the beneficiaries a generation from now; but that result, after all, is only a special example of progressive taxation. Our whole progressive income-tax structure is an example of the Congress' willingness to depart from principles of individual equity when it feels that some greater benefit can thereby be obtained.

The third reason for deferring benefits—the postponement of cost—has already served its basic purpose. The social-security law has been enacted and is widely accepted. It is still politically attractive to continue postponing the cost, but it is dangerously easy to underestimate costs of the distant future. It would be politically attractive and much more realistic to pay now the level of benefits which are provided for a generation from now—and to pay them to all aged, orphaned, and widowed citizens, not only to those on whose account there happens to be a wage record.

You have been urged to provide greater benefits—sometime in the future—and to levy taxes accordingly—also sometime in the future. Opponents of the present bill have said that the ultimate cost of the proposed benefits will be far greater than the proponents can visualize. In effect you are being asked to enact a law which may be workable if everything works out as its proponents suggest, but which could be disastrous if the passage of time shows that the opponents were better prophets.

The key of your problem is uncertainty as to the cost of what you are being asked to do. I suggest most strongly that the solution of that problem is to make the calculation as of today, not as of some date many years from now. Give the benefits now, give them to everybody now, and accept the cost now. Give benefits which you are sure, on the basis of present calculations, the country can afford now. If experience proves that the benefits you provide cost less than we are prepared to pay, then extend the benefits currently and accept the cost currently; but base your actions and decisions on present conditions—on what you can see today, not on the unknown and unknowable future. What looks like a dilemma is really an opportunity, a rare opportunity, to create a sounder structure and provide greater benefits by a single decision.

Finally, if you provide a uniform benefit plan you will make it unnecessary to keep individual accounts. I don't know the cost of the present social-security accounting establishment in Baltimore, but it must be tremendous; and yet the cost of the individual accounting system is not to be measured solely in terms of the Government's establishment. The greater part of the cost is borne by the employers of our country. Maybe you saw a while ago a cartoon which pictured a small factory and beside it a large office building labeled "Accounting Department." The cartoon exaggerated, of course, but an important part of the cost of doing business today lies in the reports and accounts which the Government requires for each individual employee. The cost of maintaining accounts of individual wage records, essential under the present benefit structure, would be quite unnecessary if a uniform benefit were provided for every eligible person. Thus the tremendous present cost of individual accounting would be a saving to credit, along with the saving from present assistance payments, against the increased present cost of providing the benefits now.

This is not, of course, the first time these ideas have been expressed. You have heard them frequently from Mr. Williamson, and you are all familiar with the excellent statement which Mr. Curtis appended to the House report in connection with this bill. I agree with their views, and I urge most strongly and sincerely that before you make any decision on House bill No. 6000 you cause to be made, by disinterested people, a complete and objective study of the desirability of accepting now the full cost of paying benefits and of freeing the country from the cost of the present individual accounting system.

Mr. CAIN. As I recall it was on the 12th day of May that the junior Senator from Washington wrote an identical letter to several hundred people throughout the country who he had reason to believe were authorities of one kind or another on the social-security question. From perhaps as many as a hundred replies I have selected 26, only because they offer more in fewer words than do the remainder of the letters. However, the Senator from Washington wishes to express his real appreciation to everyone who was thoughtful and kind enough to write to him in reply to his letter of May 12. I think the inclusion of this group of 26 letters from students of the social-security question in America will complete the record on the pending bill which the junior Senator from Washington in all sincerity and with a complete sense of humility has attempted to establish. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the 26 letters to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON NATIONAL INSURANCE CO.,
Evanston, Ill., May 23, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Thank you very much for writing me as you did on May 17 regarding H. R. 6000.

I agree with everything you say in your letter. The present social-security law needs a complete and thorough study and overhauling by experts in the field, including actuaries. Such a study should investigate the feasibility of placing the law on a pay-as-you-go basis. The members of any study commission should consist mostly of experts outside of the Government, so that the commission would not be controlled by experts now employed in the Social Security Administration.

The inequities as to benefits and taxes whereby the young workers carry the burdens of the older workers should be corrected and such benefits and taxes kept to a minimum to encourage savings through private channels.

As a matter of fact, I personally feel that compulsion of any kind is in the direction of socialism, and all people should be encouraged to save through presently existing private sources, such as banks, building and loan associations, Government bond savings, life insurance, etc. The Government should step in only where the States fail, and then only on the basis of a means or needs test.

The tax burden is now so heavy that starting a new business is often abandoned because of tax considerations. Reducing or eliminating the social-security tax would be a good place to start in taking the Government out of business and reducing Government personnel and record keeping and taxes.

I feel as you do—that nothing should be done at all now and that H. R. 6000 should not be passed. We hope that you can convince the Senate that a thorough study should be made instead.

If I can be of any assistance to you in any way please let me know.

This letter is also written in behalf of Mr. H. R. Kendall, chairman of the board of this company, to whom you addressed a similar letter.

Yours very truly,
R. J. WETTERLUND,
Vice President and General Counsel.

HEALTH AND ACCIDENT
UNDERWRITERS CONFERENCE,
Chicago, Ill., May 18, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I appreciate very much the opportunity given me in your letter of May 15, 1950, to express my views with regard to the social-security bill (H. R. 6000) and your approach to the whole problem of old-age and survivors insurance.

Personally I agree 100 percent with your approach to the problem, and while I cannot speak for our 150 members, I believe that most of them would agree with you. I feel that your letter is such an important contribution to the subject that I am sending a copy to each of our members. No doubt you will hear from many of them.

You have evidently given this question an unusual amount of thought and study, and I want to commend your realistic and courageous approach to the difficult and complicated problems involved in the care of the aged regardless of any political consideration.

While I have no doubt that the Senate version will be an improvement over the House bill, it will not even attempt to cure the inequalities, injustices, and omissions of the present law. Neither will it get away from the exceedingly cumbersome and expensive system of wage records, but will only increase the size of that operation.

I agree with you that there should be a complete overhauling of our whole old-age insurance and assistance program, and that it should be done now before more people acquire more or less of a vested interest.

The Commission which you propose should be composed of outstanding citizens representing every important segment of our population which would have an interest in the result of the investigation including general business, insurance, and labor. They should have a competent and independent technical staff, not dominated by any special interest, and especially free from control or influence of the personnel of the Social Security Administration, who are the authors of the present system and are committed to its continuation and expansion.

The working out of the details and the necessary legislation should, of course, await the report of the proposed commission.

I hope that you will succeed in bringing to pass the kind of investigation you propose, and if I can be of help to you in any way, do not hesitate to call upon me.

Sincerely yours,

C. O. PAULEY,
Managing Director.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 18, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: This is in response to your letter of May 11 requesting my views as to objectives, personnel, and methods which might be followed by a commission established to make a fundamental technical study that can lead to a constructive redesign of our social-security system.

You point out some practical results of the present "insurance" and "assistance" programs, particularly in their application to today's aged, and the importance of a basic reappraisal and revision of social security rather than merely amending these programs.

This need for a basic reappraisal is apparent when we look back on what has happened so far in the development of the social-security programs, and especially when we appraise some of the unplanned results of these programs.

I feel certain that practically everyone who has given serious thought to the problems of social security has been profoundly troubled by the trends away from the conception of individual and family responsibility in the decade and a half since the Social Security Act was adopted.

GENESIS OF SOCIAL SECURITY

Most of us can recall the considerable degree of economic distress leading to a series of emergency measures during the depression, and to the eventual adoption of the Social Security Act in 1935 on the principal basis of its being a desirable alternative to emergency relief. It cannot be overlooked that even at that time there was a school of thought interpreting the Social Security Act as an official admission that individual enterprise had failed as a method of achieving security, and that the Federal Government is obligated to underwrite the individual economic security of its citizens.

You will recall that there was a so-called economic brief compiled at that time and used before the Supreme Court in arguing the constitutionality of old-age and survivors' insurance and unemployment compensation. This brief consisted largely of depression statistics selected to maintain a thesis that a large portion of our population are helpless pawns on the chessboard of economic forces and cannot provide any reasonable security for themselves or their families. The argument was that this situation was so typical of our citizenry and so national in scope that destitution had become a matter of national concern justifying action by Congress. Furthermore, the brief put forth the thesis that destitution was so typical in the case of unemployment or attainment of age 65 that benefits paid on a presumption-of-need basis—that is, without regard to the actual situation—were justified.

We have seen a rapid development of the conception that benefit payments are a "right." Some of these payments are now called insurance, though, at the same time, the contractual implications of the term are disregarded in a demand for larger and larger monthly amounts—particularly for those whose income has been largest and whose presumptive need should be least. We have also found an untenable distinction between the millions of our citizens who have not been covered under old-age and survivors' insurance and are receiving no benefits and our fortunate aged who have been covered and can qualify for benefits costing actuarially perhaps 20 times the OASI taxes they have paid. Many of us have been troubled by the propaganda that these fortunate beneficiaries have paid for their benefits.

You will also recall that in 1935, when the Social Security Act was adopted, it was generally conceded that the fiscal position of the Federal Government was much better than that of many State and local governments, and thus that it was expedient for the Federal Government to participate by way of Federal grants to the costs of State relief programs for the needy aged, for needy children in broken homes, and for the needy blind.

We have all observed that since that time the relative fiscal positions of the Federal Government and of State governments have been almost reversed, and also that old-age and survivors' insurance now covers a large part of the population, and that the economic condition of the typical family is not to be compared with a few years back. The logic of the situation is that the needy rolls should be much smaller and that Federal grants should be no longer required. But, in fact, we find many more on the needy rolls, greatly augmented Federal grants, and pressure for bigger payments under the present programs and for covering disability and all medical care.

These Federal grants in essence represent a compulsory transfer, though the exercise of the general taxing power, of money from all of our citizens to only some of them. The Federal grant program is supported by general taxation. Human nature being what it is, this is an inherently dangerous procedure, tending to create a tremendous pressure for more and more funds from recipients and prospective recipients, while the great mass of citizens are unaware of the ultimate consequences of the system, and consequently afford no present effective checks and balances.

While obviously there is a justification for making social-security payments under some circumstances, just as obviously payments should not be made without a clear-cut justification.

PURPOSES OF COMMISSION

I should conceive it to be the function and purpose of a social-security commission to examine anew the broad problems of individual and family security, ascertain the areas where private initiative and group effort are in fact inadequate to afford opportunity for a reasonable security, and make recommendations as to the extent and through what mechanisms, Government should supply benefits to the families and individuals concerned.

This is a herculean task. It involves the employment of competent task forces to gather various pertinent data to make certain that the factual basis of the commission's conclusions is sound. It involves getting at the actual current economic facts of life instead of relying on the selected depression statistics of the economic brief previously referred to.

There was no economic brief adverse to this Government brief submitted to the court. So far as I know, no such comprehensive compilation has since been made and no attempt has been made to explore the soundness of the conclusions or the validity of the statistical data or methods reflected in the brief. Thus acceptance of the depression-born statistical conclusions urged on the court has been by default, and it is of basic importance that an up-to-date unbiased appraisal be substituted for the old economic brief. Presumably there should be a considerable difference in appropriate social-security measures in an economy where there is a widespread ability to achieve individual security and in an economy where there is no such ability. It is thus of primary importance to examine into the original factual and statistical basis of social security.

Perhaps the most important single function of the Commission itself as contrasted with its technical staff would be the formulation and publication of a social-security philosophy, based on documented premises. Quite probably the actual end result of such an effort would be the formulation by factions of the Commission of two or more social-security philosophies. I cannot believe it likely that any clear-cut philosophy could be developed to which all members would subscribe. However, if opposing philosophies are announced and spelled out by factions of the Commission, this would be a striking advance over the present situation. At least the Congress and the people would have two spelled-out philosophies presented for their choice, and each philosophy would be subjected to attack on any of its vulnerable points.

Today we have only a kind of an unacknowledged official philosophy concerning individual and state obligations. This official philosophy is evidenced by official viewpoints of the Federal Security Agency and the Department of Labor, and these viewpoints coincide for most practical purposes with the viewpoints officially expressed by labor leaders. Both have issued an enormous amount of propaganda to support their conclusions.

While a strong protest has been voiced to some specific recommendations that have been predicated on this unadmitted official philosophy, those disapproving, by and large, have not presented arguments derived from any clear-cut common philosophy.

It is important to the country that the general philosophy supporting or opposing any series of recommended changes in social security be clarified in terms of underlying assumptions as to the rights and obligations properly existing between the state and the individual, assumptions as to the individual's obligations and opportunities for working out his own economic security, and the conditions under which, and extent to which, his personal welfare may ethically require a compulsory transfer of purchasing power from others.

We badly need, for example, a critical examination and appraisal of the philosophy and assumptions underlying statements such as the following, which was made at the recent social-security hearings before the Senate Finance Committee:

"The workers are insistent that they receive adequate benefits and additional types of benefits not now included in the social-security law."

* * * * *

"Properly financed and administered, retirement benefits are as much a charge against industry as depreciation of machinery or any other contingency that industry may provide for. That the Government has a like responsibility is also true. In the instance of old-age and survivors insurance, the worker is willing and does make his contribution, thereby sharing the cost with the employer, who might well have to meet it all, and with Government who meets it in another form by taxation, referring of course again to direct aid to the States and so forth under the so-called old-age benefit plans."

SPECIFYING THE SCOPE OF COMMISSION'S WORK

It would seem to be of basic importance that the Commission's field of work should be specified to be extremely broad. By implication, at least, the work of the two advisory councils appointed by the Senate Finance Committee has been essentially the improvement of, and additions to, the programs provided for in the Social Security Act, as contrasted with a basic reappraisal of the problems of individual and family insecurity. This was likewise true of the Ways and Means Committee's technical study. There has also been, to put it mildly, resentment in some quarters where the study overlapped into areas covered by systems such as railroad, civil service, and military retirement and veterans' benefits. The underlying problems of security should mark the scope of the study, and this requires an appraisal of all the existing mechanisms, by whatever name called, which affect the broad underlying problems of security.

In the opinion of many, there are fundamental differences in philosophy and practical justification of the various governmental systems. Certainly, it is exceedingly important that they all be appraised by the Commission if it is to effectively survey the underlying problems of security. It is of general public importance that an impartial Commission get at the basic facts and furnish the public with a comprehensive description of each system, and of its purpose and justification. The public should know what each program is costing, who is footing the bill, who are covered by the system, and the effects of coverage. The appraisal should not only cover the matter of required contributions, if any, and potential benefit amounts, but also cover matters such as certainty of protection, individual incentives toward thrift, and other important consequences of each system. Only through such a comprehensive overall factual study can there be an intelligent appraisal of the underlying problem of individual and family security, what Government is doing about it, and what Government should do about it.

The scope of the study must naturally go further than an appraisal of what government is doing in the field of security. For the end result of the study—what government should do—requires an appraisal also of what individuals are doing, and what they should be expected to do for their own security, through individual or nongovernmental group action. There has been a great deal of ingenuity and effort given by government to the development of facts indicative of the shortcomings of free enterprise in providing security. It is equally important that facts be developed indicative of the limitations and consequences of governmentally operated mechanisms designed to provide security.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION

It would seem to be of fundamental importance in establishing a commission that the membership should be appointed on some basis which would insure that social-security issues would not tend to be prejudged. As it would be primarily a researcher and adviser for the Congress, there is a strong basis for its membership to be appointed by congressional leaders. To insure at least a bipartisan approach, I should suggest that one-fourth of the members be nominated by the President of the Senate, one-fourth by the minority leader of the Senate, one-fourth by the Speaker of the House, and one-fourth by the minority leader of the House.

Respectfully yours,

LEONARD J. CALHOUN.

THE SWARTWOUT CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio, May 23, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: It is an honor to be included among those you have asked for advice with respect to our social-security program.

While none of us here at Swartwout are experts in such matters, we have a community of interest in the way we work together, and an understanding of conditions which affect our own and country's welfare which is, I believe, definitely above the average. So instead of giving you my own personal answer, I gave your letter to Charles E. Cooper, superintendent; Robert Boodman, president of our local union; and Edward Sadar, who is a member of the executive board and one of the stewards of the union. The union is affiliated with Mechancis Educational Society of America.

After all had read your letter, we met and discussed the problem thoroughly. The following represents our carefully considered opinion, based upon the belief that the common-sense principles to which we must adhere in our business if we are to survive, should also be practiced in any national program:

1. Old-age benefits should be applied alike to every person who has reached the stipulated age. There is manifestly nothing either fair or sensible about including some and excluding others. We would not differentiate between those who are very well off financially, those who are modestly fixed, and others less fortunate. Nor would we require anyone to stop work in order to qualify. Each time elaborate conditions are set up, there must be an increase in the army of clerks and statisticians to check and recheck all of the data. It should be a comparatively simple matter to satisfactorily prove one's age, and then devise a means to stop the payment with death.

2. The amount of the old-age benefit is exceedingly important. It should be great enough to make certain that life can be sustained with some simple comforts, and without the recipient becoming a burden upon relatives and friends, insofar as the bare necessities of life go. But in no case should the amount be great enough to encourage people to draw old-age benefits rather than working when they are perfectly able to do so. Of course, it is easier said than done to state these basic considerations for selection of an amount for old-age benefits. We realize that the amount necessary to support a person in one part of the country is much less than in another part of the country; also, that the matter of health has much to do with it. We would be inclined to make the amount large enough to sustain a person in the more expensive areas and not worry about the excess of payment in the less expensive areas because the money would be spent anyway and add to the general activity of business. The greatest hazard to be avoided is having the amount great enough to lead many people to draw old-age benefits rather than work.

3. We would put the whole payment on a pay-as-you-go basis. There are at least two basic defects in the present method. In the first place, the idea that there are true credits to everyone who is making a contribution is fictitious. Inasmuch as the collections have been put into Government bonds, which we owe to ourselves, and which must ultimately be retired through taxation, it simply means that we, collectively, have spent the money that has been collected and are going to have to produce it all over again in sufficient amount to pay benefits. So it seems to us a lot more sensible to admit that we are really on a pay-as-you-go basis, and set up a minimum amount of cash which must be maintained at all times to cover variations in collections as compared with payments, but not go beyond that. It does not seem to us that it should be considered as insurance in the usual sense because the only insurance is our earning ability to earn and pay the necessary amount when the time comes.

In the second place, when collections are made as at present and credited to the individuals, there is a tremendous amount of work that must be done by the employer. This costs money and involves a lot of people who are not producing the things and services we all want. On top of that, when these figures come into Washington, another army of thousands of people must handle them and sort them out, again with a great waste of human effort. On top of that, if we are to include everybody under the present plan, imagine the difficulty of reporting on some small percent of pay all the laundresses and people in domestic service who are not in any way connected with a corporation that has adequate bookkeeping facilities.

4. This brings us to the matter of collections. As it is both impractical and very expensive to go on as at present, we suggest the money be collected by taxation in a way which will eventually come out of everyone's income. While we, who derive our own earnings from the success of the Swartwout Co., are not particularly anxious to saddle taxes on corporations, it would seem as though a specific part of the income tax on corporations might be devoted to that purpose. Obviously, the taxes paid by corporations must, in the long run, be included in the selling prices of the products. Since nearly every article and every service we all buy is manufactured or provided through the efforts of corporations, it would seem that a tax arrived at in this way would ultimately be paid by all of us pretty much in proportion to the money we spend, which is in turn related to our income.

5. We would then do the entire administration job through the States. The sole function of the Federal Government would be to see that there was a uniform law which did truly apply to every single citizen who had reached the qualifying age, and then collect the money and distribute it to the States. It would take a very small office force on the part of the Federal Government to do this job. The distribution to the States would, perforce, be in proportion to the need of the States, which would, in turn, be based upon certified statements each year as to the number of people qualified to receive old-age benefits in each State. We would go farther than that, and carry that responsibility for a certified list of qualified citizens down to the smallest community within the State. It would be the job, for example, of the Government in the village in which I reside, to receive and check applications, and then furnish such a list to the State. It would cost very little to do this and the State, on its part, would also have a relatively small clerical job to maintain such checks as were needed upon the reliability of the local lists, and then pay out the money according to those lists.

6. Finally, so that everyone could understand exactly what was going on, and be able to recognize objectionable practices if they crept in, we would like to see the Federal Government publish an annual financial statement. Our first thoughts are that such a statement would show, on one sheet and with respect to all of the States in the United States, the following information:

(a) Number of qualified recipients as of the year end.

(b) Estimated percent of population represented by these recipients.

(c) Dollars paid to the recipients.

(d) Dollars received from the States.

(e) State administrative costs, including local municipalities.

(f) Percent of State administrative cost to the payments made by the State.

(g) Total Federal administrative cost.

(h) Percent of Federal administrative cost to either the money paid out or money received.

(i) Total dollars paid out.

(j) Total dollars received.

(k) Balance in fund.

(l) Tax rate for current year.

(m) Proposed tax rate for next year.

With this information available, reasonably promptly after the year end (and it should be a simple thing to provide that), the working and cost of this old-age benefit plan could be very plain to anyone.

In order to maintain the minimum cash balance necessary in the fund, the rate of taxation should be varied every year. This again, it seems to us, would be a very simple thing to figure, and one that would be easily understood by everyone.

Again we want to thank you for your courtesy in asking our judgment in this matter. We are vitally interested, all of us. The group in our company consists of 250 people in shop and office, and we do about $2,500,000 worth of business each year, in the industrial equipment field. We also share in the profits of our business. We want to keep on doing that, and we want to do it in a way which will be better and better for us, and better and better for everyone else, and at the same time with a minimum of hardship when our folks or others reach the age when they are no longer able to work.

Sincerely yours,

D. K. SWARTWOUT,
President.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., May 16, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN.

DEAR SENATOR: I have not made a detailed study of H. R. 6000. However, I have read the bill which Congressman KENNEDY sent me several weeks ago at my request.

I am very strongly opposed to H. R. 6000 for the following reasons:

1. Only a comprehensive actuarial study can provide a reasonably reliable estimate of the future annual disbursements under the bill. However, it is obvious to me as an actuary, that ultimately the annual disbursements will require tax revenues equal to at least 8 percent of the payrolls of all persons eligible to receive benefits, and that possibly the disbursements will require ultimately, annual revenues equal to as much as 16 or 20 percent of such payrolls.

A bill requiring such enormous revenues for its maintenance should not be enacted until actuarial estimates of cost, based upon adequate study, have been made; and, outstanding economists, using such estimates, have expressed their opinions as to the effect of such a program and its cost upon the welfare of the American people.

Without such prior actuarial and economic study, enactment of H. R. 6000 may readily be found in practice to be an actual serious ultimate detriment to the American people, instead of a boon.

2. The bill does not provide death and old-age economic protection for 100 percent of the American people but is applicable only to certain portions of the people—perhaps 40 to 80 percent. Many classes of low- and medium-income people whose economic need and moral claim to such protection are equally as great are excluded from the benefits. However, they are not excluded from the expenses. Either directly through taxation to make up ultimately the difference between the disbursements and revenues provided in the bill; or, indirectly through the increase in the cost of consumer goods that necessarily results from the bill, these excluded people will contribute to pay the costs. H. R. 6000 does broaden the base to cover many groups that are not within the benefit provisions of the present social-security laws. It would not be difficult to devise a revised, and, I believe, a more equitable law that would cover all of the people who have need for such protection and who have an equally valid moral claim for it.

I strongly recommend:

(A) Rejection of H. R. 6000.

(B) Appointment of a senatorial or congressional committee with power to employ actuarial and economic experts, to make a comprehensive study with the aid of such experts, and prepare a bill that will provide death and old-age protection on an economic-needs basis for all American citizens and lifetime residents of the country.

Very sincerely yours,

E. H. HEZLETT,
Fellow of the Society of Actuaries.

THE DAILY TRIBUNE,
Royal Oak, Mich., May 18, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAIN: Your realistic letter about the social-security bill (H. R. 6000) and the social-security situation in general is a most encouraging exhibition of common sense. That you cannot go along with the highly deceptive proposal now before Congress is a tribute to both your honesty and your courage.

Describing our present social-security system as insurance is a swindle which our citizens who are now 20, 30, or 40 years of age will wake up to some day. I believe my own feeling on this matter is much the same as yours; that no amount of wishing to help others, no emotional mouthing of high-sounding phrases, will set aside the established laws of arithmetic. Two plus two plus two always makes six, whether it refers to plain, single dollars or to billions.

My own inquiries disclose the astonishing fact that the average citizen thinks our present social-security system is a scientifically planned way of insurance; that the workers of this country (those now covered) and their employers are actually piling up sufficient funds to care for future payments. There is almost no appreciation of a factor pointed out in your letter—that stopgap, old-age assistance is not gradually diminishing but is actually expanding at an unbelievable rate.

Certainly a completely independent investigation of our whole social-security program is urgently demanded. Such an inquiry should be conducted by a commission with a definite minority membership of Government officials or employees. Set some real insurance actuaries and some trained financial men to work to analyze this situation just as Dun & Bradstreet would look into the financial standing of a corporation or individual.

Let us do everything possible to install and maintain a social-security program that will be thoroughly understood by our citizens and that will have a chance of doing what it is supposed to do.

I am enclosing copies of three columns I have written for our newspaper (circulation, 23,184) on social security. There is always the risk of oversimplifying the situation or particular phases of it, but in writing for daily newspaper publication one must always take that chance. So I try in each instance to pound on one point of the problem, for the sake of emphasis and (I hope) clarification.

Congratulations again on the intelligence and forthrightness you are displaying on this vital matter.

Sincerely yours,

FLOYD J. MILLER,
President.

P. S.—I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to our Senators from Michigan and to GEORGE A. DONDERO, the Representative in Congress from this district.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: It is my understanding that you contemplate leading the floor fight against H. R. 6000.

Even though it is my understanding that the Senate Finance Committee has made some changes in this bill, in my opinion there should not be any extension of social security until such time as a fair and impartial commission has had an opportunity to make a survey of what is necessary. Therefore, I welcome your opposition to this bill, and wish you every success.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of May 16 is most encouraging.

I hope sincerely that we may soon have a thorough and fundamental review of social security. It is preferable that this study precede any revision of the present act, but it will still be needed even if the bill reported out yesterday becomes a law.

The study commission should weigh the relative responsibilities to be assumed by the community, the individual and his employer. It should develop an orderly method to discharge the community part of the responsibility. This needs to be well within our power to pay and must leave a sufficient incentive to thrift.

The answer will be futile unless it can command broad public support. For that reason I would like to see the commission include men with experience in legislation. It should also enlist economists, tax specialists, and actuaries.

The commission should have a sufficient operating budget that it can retain independent specialists and thus secure information from all pertinent sources.

Sincerely,

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Thank you for your letter regarding social security legislation.

I agree with what you have to say about social security generally and the pending legislation in particular. In fact I believe that there is a very strong feeling among actuaries who have taken a special interest in social insurance, that the system should properly be placed on a current cost-current benefit basis. I am entirely in accord with the idea that a fundamental technical study—objective and nonpolitical—is needed for our social security system.

You are no doubt familiar with the recent testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance. A number of insurance men including actuaries contributed to this testimony.

You will find an ardent supporter of your views in one of our leading actuaries, Mr. W. R. Williamson. He was at one time actuarial consultant to the Social Security Board and has studied both our own social insurance system and those of other countries. I mention him in particular because he lives in Washington and would, I am sure, be glad to help you in any way he can.

If I can be of any further help, please let me know.

Cordially,

LEIGH CRUESS.

AMERICAN COLLEGE OF SURGEONS,
Chicago, Ill., May 16, 1950.

The Honorable HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I agree in principle with everything you say in your letter of May 12. One unfortunate result of the policies pursued by the Federal Government since March 4, 1933 is the almost complete eradication of thrift among our people. Government paternalism has been one factor and excessive taxation another.

There is no doubt but that the rapid aging of our population has created a problem—a problem which will grow for at least a few years. Reluctance of business and industry to employ people over 45 years of age has accentuated this problem.

The plain truth is that we are now headed for, if not actually in, an economy in which, as my good friend Frank Dickenson likes to say, the old people are climbing piggy-back upon the young and riding to the grave. This adds to the difficulty of young people being thrifty.

There is not the slightest doubt but that the entire social-security program is in great need of study and reevaluation before it is expanded. A commission, made up of the type of people you describe, would be the only body which could produce a sound study. This should be made up of economists, physicians interested in the care of the aged, and what might be called citizens of the national community. Professional welfare workers would be a menace. The commission could obtain all of the technical assistance needed and it is not necessary to include technicians in its membership. The greatest need is for an honest actuarial study of the situation—not the kind that is constantly being made by the Federal Security Administration.

I feel sure that every American who wants to keep this country a land of opportunity will support you wholeheartedly in your effort.

Sincerely yours,

PAUL R. HAWLEY, M. D.,

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of May 16 about H. R. 6000 and about the deliberations of the Senate Finance Committee in connection therewith interested me greatly.

When H. R. 6000 was under consideration, I sent to several Members of the House of Representatives the enclosed letter, marked "A" in the upper right-hand corner. Incidentally, when this came to the attention of Representative ROBERT W. KEAN, he sent me a copy of Report No. 1300 of the House of Representatives, Eighty-first Congress, first session, which contains a report of a minority committee, of which Representative KEAN was a member. No doubt this document has come to your attention.

When the amendments to the Social Security Act were being discussed in the Senate, I sent to each of our New Jersey Senators a memorandum, a copy of which is enclosed and is marked "B" in the upper right-hand corner.

These will indicate to some extent my current thinking on this important topic.

My suggestion of the omission of the yearly increase in the benefit for each year of coverage (the so-called increment) is in harmony with the point expressed in the paragraph at the top of the second page of your letter.

In fact, I am becoming more strongly of the opinion that a straight pay-as-you-go plan would have much to commend it, not the least of the advantages being the ability to abandon the complicated and huge mass of records established and maintained in the Baltimore bureau to implement the terms of the act. Procedures which are sound and, in fact, essential in the operation of private insurance and annuity plans are not necessarily most suitable for public plans, and the management of the latter must be regarded in very broad terms.

The suggestion in the second paragraph of your letter that the matter be placed in the hands of a competent commission seems to be timely and likely to produce useful results.

Yours very truly,

JOHN S. THOMPSON.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I am in thorough sympathy with the views expressed in your May 11 letter.

You ask that I write you about the objectives, the personnel, and the method of study that might be pursued by an independent commission on social security.

The objective is to obtain a workable system. It should have a minimum of administrative cost and bureaucracy. Clearly, it must be adjusted to the economic strength of the country. We should give an assurance of basic security to widows with children, to orphans, and to the aged. Equally, we must not destroy the incentive to save. This system should be separate from relief. The Federal Government should get out of the old age assistance programs of the individual States. Any system supported by taxes should aim to provide a floor of protection. It should avoid discrimination. It will not take the place of employer plans because the problem of retiring the older workers at a pension which will look reasonable to them and their fellow workers will remain.

As regards personnel of such a commission, Mr. W. R. Williamson (statement, January 30, 1950, before Senate Finance Committee) has listed tax men, business economists, financial men, demographers, and actuaries as typifying the thorough professional approach which should be given, and I would agree. It is important that the study should be in the hands of non-Government men. Also, sufficient time should be given for an adequate study; Mr. Hoover said a year.

If, as you say, men of standing—independent, competent, and informed in this area, are secured for this commission then they and their leader will probably be most competent to outline the methods to be followed. I think the principal members, of whatever profession or calling, should include the whole study as their field but each group should do the specialized work for which the members are best fitted. For example, I would expect that the group of actuaries on the commission would be particularly concerned with what level of benefits at what starting age can be provided by what tax.

I thank you for writing me and giving me an opportunity to comment on this matter of such vital importance. Unfortunately, due to the railroad strike or other reason, I did not receive your letter till yesterday and I hope you may get this in time for your purpose.

Sincerely yours,

A. E. ARCHIBALD.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Your letter of May 12 in regard to social-security bill (H. R. 6000) was received.

I find myself of the same opinion as you express in your letter.

The Federal participation in providing benefits for old people on a means test relief basis is very wrong in my opinion. If it is not stopped it will ultimately annihilate the regular social security old age plan.

I do not regard myself as having enough information to criticize the present social-security benefits, but I heartily agree with the thought that something like the Hoover Commission should study them and make recommendations. I think such a commission might well include such men as Reinhard A. Hohaus, actuary of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. I have followed his reports and discussions of the social-security program for many years and regard him as well informed, sound, capable, and, I believe, in a position where he can be free to view the subject from the standpoint of the interest of the public and the Federal Government.

I would also suggest the name of William Rulon Williamson as a member of the actuarial fraternity, who is capable and intensely interested in the social-security program. If you are not in touch with him, you should most certainly appeal to him. His address is: W. Rulon Williamson, senior actuarial consultant, the Wyatt Co., 3400 Fairhill Drive, Washington 20, D. C.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: It was a pleasure and a very gratifying experience to receive your letter of May 16. I am pleased to know that there are those in the Senate, such as yourself, who are becoming increasingly conscious of the real implication contained in H. R. 6000.

I have, with great interest, followed the development of the social-security legislation and particularly the progress of the efforts of the present Social Security Administration to obtain revisions in the present act which can only break down further our system of free enterprise and the noncollectivist way of life.

I completely agree with Senator TAFT and many others who are finally realizing that the word "insurance" is very improperly used when referring to any benefits under the Social Security Act. Our social security program is not insurance at all. When stripped of its ramifications it is only a program which gives benefits to certain groups who qualify under the terms of the act. The program is supported by taxes also levied against certain groups, but there is no relationship between the taxes and the benefits. Such an arrangement is completely foreign to the true concept of insurance.

I am glad to know that you have concluded that you cannot vote for the bill containing the provisions of H. R. 6000. I believe that you are completely sound in urging that the social-security establishment be left as it is, pending a thorough completely independent investigation and overhauling. I believe you are also completely right in your statement that patching up unworkable social-security programs is bound to create more maladjustments than it cures.

I would urge you to fight hard for the establishment of some sort of Hoover Commission that would undertake the study along the lines which you have in mind. There are men of standing—independent, competent, and informed in this area who could help in this task. There are not so many as there should be. The field of social insurance, and all phases related thereto, is comparatively new and the problems involved are so vast that few competent minds have been developed which understand the real problems. Men like M. Albert Linton, president of the Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia; R. A. Hohaus, actuary of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.; and W. R. Williamson, consulting actuary of Washington, D. C., are men who, in my opinion, really understand the ramifications of a social-security system, not only from the actuarial standpoint, but from the economic, social, and political standpoints as well.

As to the method of study that might be pursued by such a commission, I fear I have little to offer. It would, however, seem to me that whatever our eventual social-security system should develop into, it should be based on a policy and objectives which are completely nonpolitical. This is perhaps the greatest obstruction in obtaining an adequate study at this time. In the 15 years since social security was first spread across our Federal statutes, we have learned much which was not available at the time the Social Security Act of 1935 and the 1939 amendment were passed. I believe that the knowledge gained during that time has not been used adequately in the development of H. R. 6000.

The results of social-security systems on the Federal Government level throughout the world are certainly not compatible with the free-enterprise system which we so highly prize in our country. Real factual and competent analyses of all of these systems should be included in any study forming the basis of a recommendation for change in our social-security system.

Incidentally, I have noticed that just this week the Senate Finance Committee has approved a modification of H. R. 6000. The newspapers did not carry what I believe to be the major modification; namely, the provisions for benefits in the event of permanent and total disability. It is my understanding that the Senate committee eliminated that provision, and I am certainly glad to know that they did that much. In my opinion, if the provision for permanent and total disability were to be included in any revision at this time, it would be a great mistake. The inclusion of disability benefits brings an entirely new concept, entirely new administrative problems into a system which is already suffering from unworkable provisions. If the Senate committee did not eliminate the permanent and total disability provisions, this bill should be defeated on that score alone, in my opinion.

I am sending a copy of this letter to the two Senators from Wisconsin. If, in addition thereto, you would care to give me the names of other Senators who might be influenced by similar letters, I would be pleased to write them also.

Very truly yours,

WALTER L. RUGLAND,
Actuary, Fellow of the Society of Actuaries.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM,
Washington, May 19, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR HARRY: Your letter of May 16, unfortunately, catches me in preparation for a brief western trip, and, therefore, I am unable to give you all of the help which you ask.

I am gratified, however, to find that the conclusion to which you have come on the social-security program is so much in line with my own thinking. Your thought that what is needed at this time is a thorough and independent restudy and assessment of the whole problem of social security is one in which I strongly concur. It is indeed important to oppose the pending social-security bill and to urge as an alternative the appointment of a commission along the lines of the Hoover idea.

At this time I am not in a position to comment on the matter of the personnel and method of study that might be pursued by such a commission. I do feel, however, that a study and review commission, if provided for, should be composed of men who are socially and economically liberal, but definitely sound in their monetary and fiscal views. It ought to be possible to find men of standing and competence who have these qualifications. Given a commission of this type, adequately staffed with technicians of broad training and experience in the field, I am confident that appropriate methods of inquiry and study will be developed.

You may be interested in some views on our social-security problem which I expressed in a recent speech. I quote them in full:

"Regarding social security, let me say at the outset that I think this is a field in which a great deal can be done to provide for a more stable expansion of consumer expenditures, which would help to bring about a more balanced increase in capital expenditures. But if we want such a social-security system we will have to change our whole approach to the subject.

"In the first place, it must be a Federal Government program and it must be greatly expanded in scope from the one that is in existence today. The Government should underwrite and guarantee for all of its citizens unemployment, income, education, health, and old-age security up to its ability to pay for such benefits and at the same time maintaining a climate that would produce sufficient savings and incentives to provide needed productive facilities for an increasing standard of living and an increasing population. By doing this, the Government would assure a basic level of purchasing power in the economy that would provide a certain market for a substantial share of the commodities and services produced by our industry and agriculture.

"Secondly, the social security benefits should be paid for currently out of general tax receipts. They should not be financed out of payroll tax receipts that have been accumulated over time in a large reserve fund. Payroll taxes are too heavy a burden directly on consumption and indirectly on investment and are therefore undesirable when what we need in the long run is increased private consumption and investment. Reserve funds have to find lodgment in Government obligations, the proceeds from which must be spent to pay for Government deficits or to retire other outstanding obligations.

"These ideas on Federal social security are by no means radical. I should like to quote from an editorial published in the New York Herald Tribune on March 2:

" 'What our social security system demands today is not a mere expansion of the existing structure; it demands first of all a thorough restudy of the problem and revision of that structure if it is to have any chance of carrying the much vaster needs now contemplated for it.

" 'The system was set up in 1936. Thirteen years' experience has established beyond serious question the principle of national and public responsibility for providing security against the hazards of old age and dependence; the same experience has at the same time led powerfully to the conclusion that the system was not well designed, that it is extravagantly wasteful, and in an important sense a virtual failure.

* * * * *

" 'It is impossible for such a plan to offer any insurance against changing price levels and particularly so when the very operation of the plan can have its inflationary effect. It cannot in any real sense save up through a reserve fund, when Government bonds are the only possible investment for the fund and its only "earnings" are those provided by the taxpayers who meet the interest on the bonds. However, the financing may be juggled, the provision for old age is a current cost on the community, coming in any given year out of the current production, and it is already an urgent question whether a frank shift to a current cost or pay-as-you-go system would not yield a structure far more economical, more equitable, more adequate to current needs and offering much more genuine security for the citizen's future than the present one.'

"I could not state my views on the social-security question more simply and directly than the editors of the New York Herald Tribune have done in that editorial.

"As a final point on social security, I should like to say that I think the recent growth in private pension funds is a very undesirable long-run economic development. I am opposed to this development primarily because I feel that the growth of these funds will tend to affect the functioning of the economy adversely in two important ways. They will result in the further accumulation of funds in reserves seeking low risk investment opportunities. This encourages Government deficits to provide securities to absorb accumulating reserves. They will also result in some redistribution of income from low to higher income groups. This will come about because the financing of private pension funds will increase the prices of goods and services that are purchased in the main by the low-income groups. The pensions will be paid, on the other hand, only to a few selected and relatively well-paid groups of executives and industrial workers.

"I am also opposed to the development of private pension funds on other economic grounds. They will discriminate against small companies, for only large companies can afford them. The growth of private pension funds will make it even more difficult for small businesses to survive in a world of industrial giants. Private pension funds will also greatly inhibit the mobility of labor from one firm to another for workers will be extremely reluctant to forfeit the pension rights they have built up. They will also probably lead to discrimination against older workers, for employers will hesitate to employ people near the retirement age."

You will gather from these paragraphs that I am in full agreement with you that the matter of social security is one of "vital importance to the preservation of our system of free enterprise and the noncollectivist way of life."

Please be assured of my every encouragement to your effort to correct basic errors. If I can be of further help in this matter, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Sincerely yours,

M. S. ECCLES.

The Honorable HARRY P. CAIN,
Committee on Public Works,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAIN: The matter covered by your letter of May 12 is most timely, and I am pleased to offer a few views on the social-security legislation now pending. These comments follow the points brought out in your letter and will necessarily be brief.

First of all, I agree that a thorough review by an independent commission formed of experts in various fields (among others: social insurance, economics, law, finance, and actuarial science) is essential to the construction of a sound program. The present method of separating old-age benefits between insurance and assistance is little short of ridiculous, in my opinion, and merely affords an excuse for poorly conceived and loosely administered relief programs by the States. Furthermore, it appears that administrative difficulties in the way of universal OASI coverage are more fancied than real, and result from thinking which is restricted to the framework of the present law. That old-age benefits might well be provided on a different basis seems never to have occurred to many advocates of H. R. 6000.

Unless a suitable method of administering universal old-age benefits is devised, and unless the total present burden is properly related to social-security taxes on a pay-as-you-go basis, we are going to be faced with public misunderstanding of the true costs and many unsound proposals for increased benefits. I believe in getting the OASI payments up and the assistance payments down, as soon as possible.

Like you, I am opposed to the keeping of detailed wage records to determine benefits, and believe that social benefits, being in the nature of subsistence, are properly divorced from the concept of individual equity—the range in possible benefits under the present law, according to earnings level, is quite narrow already, and hardly justifies the detailed record-keeping—a proper flat benefit under present conditions might be between $50 and $75 a month. Likewise, for receipt of benefit, consideration might be given to an age condition alone, although it might be desirable to deny benefits to anyone who has not filed a personal income-tax return for a specified minimum period of years—such return possibly including a special line for the social-security tax.

A change in the qualifications as indicated should silence the schemes for stamp books and other complicated administrative procedures, as well as induce greater honesty in the submission of tax returns. In connection with the latter, assuming that a simple method could be found to correlate information between the Treasury Department and the Social Security Board, there would be no objection to scaling the benefits over a moderate range, according to income reported in the return. This feature might, however, have to be omitted entirely.

Because of the future load on productive workers to carry the old-age pensioners, I am not sure that I favor automatic payment regardless of earnings status, even though this would simplify the administration. Particularly, I do not think it wise to contemplate age 65 as the automatic age at which payments are to begin, whether or not an employee continues to work, since it may well become necessary or desirable to retire the average employee at a later age in the future.

I look forward to hearing of your success in furthering this important project.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK L. GRIFFIN, Jr.,
Vice President and Actuary.

JOHN HANCOCK MUTUAL
LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Boston, Mass., May 19, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Member, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I was very much interested in the comments in your letter of May 12 with reference to H. R. 6000 and the social-security problems related thereto. It is easy to understand why you have concluded that you cannot vote for the provisions embodied in H. R. 6000 nor in the forthcoming Senate version thereof and why you are urging instead that "the social-security establishment be left as it is pending a thorough and completely independent investigation and overhauling."

In particular, you question the necessity of the dual system of Federal old-age assistance and old-age and survivors insurance; you favor a pay-as-you-go system with age as probably the only qualification; you favor providing a reasonable floor of pension benefit which would leave room for personal thrift to make up the balance; and you favor retaining the present taxable maximum of $3,000 of annual earnings.

You have asked my views on this question, including "the objectives, the personnel, and the method of study that might be pursued" by the special commission which you have in mind.

In reply I am pleased to state that I share with you your general apprehension about our social-security program as it now stands and that H. R. 6000 is not the way to solve the problem.

1. I agree with you that there is no justification for permanently continuing the present dual system of Federal old-age assistance and old-age and survivors insurance. The question of abandoning the Federal assistance program and the means by which this is accomplished, is a subject requiring very serious consideration.

2. I would place more emphasis on the pay-as-you-go system and would favor a relinquishment of the present deferred-benefit system, which by its nature implies the accumulation of reserves.

In this connection, you may be interested to know that in 1944 and 1945 I was a member of a special legislative commission appointed to study the retirement systems of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and its political subdivisions. This commission recommended the use of a nonreserve basis as far as public funds are involved, the annual appropriation by the appropriate governmental unit of the share of the total pensions to be paid from public funds, and the very gradual release of reserve funds previously accumulated under predecessor systems, as they become needed to partially offset the rising costs due to increasing pension loads. This recommendation was adopted and the anticipated beneficial results are being slowly realized.

3. The objectives of the contemplated study might include such topics as—

(a) The extension of the social-security system to cover the millions of people now excluded. This phase of the study should include not only the question of including in the system more groups presently employed, but also the present retired aged in the population who are not under benefit in the old-age and survivors insurance program. This phase of the study would depend partly on the solution to the problem in the next following item.

(b) Consideration of the problem of removing the Federal Government from the assistance field by bringing all, or substantially all, the present aged into immediate benefit and by removing all Federal assistance to the States, leaving to the States or municipalities the entire problem of aid to any persons not covered, or not amply enough covered, by the old-age and survivors insurance system.

(c) Consideration of the respective merits of various types of benefit formulas, the degree to which such formulas should depend upon wages earned prior to receipt of benefit, and the associated problem of the administrative costs of maintaining wage records.

(d) Retention of the provision for lump-sum benefits only in cases where no other benefits become payable.

(e) Reconsideration of the schedule for increasing payroll taxes in the light of the program finally adopted.

(f) Increase from $15 to $50 a month in the amount of earnings permitted without loss of social-security benefit (no limit after age 70).

(g) Study of proper integration of private pension plans and social-security benefits.

In this connection it will be difficult, if not unwise, because of serious overlapping, to extend social-security benefits to various classes of public employees already amply provided for under pension plans supported in large part by public funds at State and municipal levels, as well as at Federal levels. In the case of pension plans applicable to nonpublic employees, benefits may be adjusted relatively easily to reflect those available under the social-security program. This is not the case with plans covering public employees since such plans arise from special legislation, the amending of which is difficult to accomplish.

(h) Encouragement for extension of private contributory pension plans to supplement the floor of coverage provided by social-security benefits.

(i) Question of enforced retirement at age 65 of employees who are able to stay in employment.

(j) Employment opportunities for elderly people.

(k) Problems involved in the care and housing of the aged.

(l) Consideration of the governmental level at which the problems in (j) and (k) are to be handled.

(m) Inadvisability of providing for a system of total and permanent disability benefits on a Federal basis, and the advisability of handling such benefits, if at all, at a State or local level, possibly on the basis of a means test.

4. As to the personnel of such a commission, I assume above all that it should be nonpartisan and that it should include representatives from the fields of industry, labor, farming, medicine, social services, and insurance. The representative organizations functioning in these fields can furnish you with the names of suitable and qualified representatives. For the life-insurance industry, I would suggest you communicate with Mr. Bruce E. Shepherd, manager, Life Insurance Association of America, 488 Madison Avenue, New York 22, N. Y.

5. I would urge you to refer to the papers on Social Budgeting developed by Mr. W. R. Williamson, at present a consulting actuary residing in Washington, which outline a solution to our present social-security difficulties. I refer you also to the speech of the Honorable CARL T. CURTIS, of Nebraska, in the House of Representatives on October 4, 1949, with which you are undoubtedly familiar. I believe, also, that the writings on this subject by the two actuaries, Mr. R. A. Hohaus and Mr. M. A. Linton, would be valuable. As you may know, the former is an actuary connected with the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. and the latter is also an actuary, serving as president of the Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co.

6. As to the method of approach, I assume that this would consist of a period of intensive study by the special commission, followed by public hearings. In this connection, I would call your attention to the recent study made by the Brookings Institution in connection with social-security problems. Undoubtedly such a commission should seek the advice of experts in the various fields to which the problems are closely related.

In closing, I would like to stress above all that any revision of benefits under our social-security system should not elevate such benefits above a reasonable maximum floor level and that ample room should remain for additional benefits to be provided above such level through regular employee and employer pension schemes and other vehicles designed to encourage and stimulate individual effort.

I trust that you will find these comments of help to you in your investigation of this very important problem.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD A. GROUT,
Vice President and Actuary.

BANKERS LIFE CO.,
Des Moines, Iowa, May 18, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It was a pleasure to receive your letter in regard to the social security bill (H. R. 6000). The bill in its original form seemed to me to go too far and I am glad that the Senate committee has taken out some of the features from the original bill.

It may be that this bill has gone so far through the legislative process that it is not possible to postpone consideration of it, but, of course, that is in the hands of Senators and Congressmen.

I sincerely hope that before any more tinkering is done with the Social Security Act, Congress will appoint a broad committee which will study not only the Social Security Act, but the whole broad problem of social benefits which at present are covered in many different acts. When we deal with the whole problem piecemeal we are very apt to find overlapping benefits, omissions, conflicting doctrines, and many other things of that sort.

In a pioneer society the people upon whom misfortunes like disability, unemployment, the declining powers of old age, blindness, etc., do not starve but in various ways they are taken care of by society, either in the form of relatives, local authorities, charities, or by government. In all such cases, these unfortunates receive a basic minimum amount from such sources. It must be remembered however, that all such amounts spent for adult unfortunates as well as the amounts spent to raise our children to the age when they go to work must be provided from the national income of those who are at work, and by those, I mean individuals as well as the legal entities we call corporations.

In our more complex civilization, the doctrine has arisen that these people and children must be taken care of by a more centralized body than in the pioneer society, and consequently, we have the Social Security Act, unemployment insurance, aid for children, and blind and other retirement acts. The benefits under all these plans just as in the pioneer society must come out of the national income of individuals and corporations. It is most important that we keep this in mind and that we do not raise the benefits of any of these various plans to a figure that makes the whole cost too much of a drain on the sources of contributions. It is, therefore, vitally important that we survey the whole picture as one unit instead of, as I have already mentioned, tinkering with first one piece and then another piece.

Now to return to the Social Security Act itself. Back in 1935, it was most unfortunate that the insurance idea used in individual annuities and pension plans got mixed up with the Government's plan. A governmental, compulsory plan is entirely different from the usual insurance plans because the Government has the power of compulsion. In a private plan, since there is no compulsion, it would be quite the natural thing in human nature to postpone buying insurance until one is ill and to postpone buying an annuity until one is about to retire. We have seen the troubles of assessment companies which had no power of compulsion. It is for this fundamental reason that all insurance plans require the accumulation of reserves. When one comes, however, to governmental plans with the power of compelling people to join, we can very well use a pay-as-you-go system or one that is practically that. The insurance concept in the original Social Security Act has led us into all sorts of novelties such as taking care of those already old in a different manner to those in the plan. This other plan, old-age assistance, has not worked out at all as it was originally thought and instead, it is growing rapidly while the insurance social security concept is growing slowly.

The whole question is a very involved one. I hope that I am not boring you with a few of my thoughts. I sincerely hope that Congress will take its time to look thoroughly into the over-all problem and that it will appoint a broad committee who will carefully consider the whole problem of social benefits and all its ramifications and study the road in which we are going. I firmly believe that if this is done, we will clearly understand and be able to plan for methods of taking care of unfortunate people in our system of free enterprise but we must approach the problem with our eyes open or we may very well find ourselves with a system that has all the glittering promises that are held out by collectivist systems of the world which in reality are a cloak for slavery.

I hope our paths cross some day before long so we may chat at greater length than is possible in a letter.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

E. M. MCCONNEY, President.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: In response to your letter of the 11th of May concerning social security legislation, I quite agree with you that a thorough and completely independent investigation is required of our social security program. Also, I am favorably disposed toward a pay-as-you-go system with the retirement payments linked to a payroll tax.

The commission selected to study the social security program, should be nonpartisan, nonpolitical, and composed of highly qualified experts. Such men, I feel certain, could be obtained from universities and also from the business world. Time will be required for such an investigation in order that the report may be searchingly thorough. A hazardous guess is it would take at least a year from the time the committee is appointed before the report is completed.

I appreciate your letter and would be happy to be of any assistance I can.

Sincerely yours,

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I was extremely interested in your letter of May 13, setting forth your views on the present social security program and your thoughts concerning the need for a change in our thinking concerning such legislation. I agree with you in the points you covered in your letter.

To confuse old-age assistance and old-age and survivors benefits with insurance as is ordinarily construed to cover other hazards is fundamentally wrong. In my opinion the setting up of a so-called insurance fund to cover a situation which, while remote, nevertheless is predictable insofar as we know that it is going to develop and only unpredictable insofar as we cannot now assess its magnitude, is overly optimistic thinking. Why we should not, as you suggested, adopt a realistic and practical approach to this problem by putting it on a "pay-as-you-go system" I cannot understand, unless it is because of the fact that the magic in the use of the word "insurance" insures the sale of the idea to the American people.

Everything contained in your description of the system as you visualize it I personally feel is logical and practicable. Certainly it would have the effect of placing squarely before the people the question of whether or not they wanted to embark on such a program, and from time to time would serve to remind them, at the time of the budget for the forthcoming year, of the inevitably mounting costs of such a program even on the conservative basis on which you outlined it. Actually, such a program, as I see it, would be no more than a universally administered relief fund, offered without the necessity of a means test.

I have given relatively little thinking to the subject of exactly how this program might be investigated, but it would seem to me that as a matter of course a commission established for this purpose would need to rely heavily on the services of population experts as well as actuaries and experienced statisticians. I have no doubt that in many insurance companies as well as in a number of universities there are men of this ability who would be competent to view this problem in an objective and dispassionate manner. A commission embarking on such a study should hope to arrive at a reasonable computation of the year-to-year cost to this country for the kind of program you outline at some date in the future, for example, 1960, with alternative costs based on greater or less benefits. Such a group should recognize the fallibility of putting these costs on anything but a percentage basis or in some terms which would make the cost understandable in terms of future inflation. For example, our recent upswing in pension demands is a sobering reminder of the fact that sums set aside for old-age benefits today may prove to be entirely inadequate in the expanding-economy era of the future. Mere dolarrs set aside, therefore, are likely to constitute a poor yardstick of actual cost to the Nation as compared to some other method of expression.

It would seem to me that the first field of exploration on the part of such a commission as you suggest should be an attempt at an honest appraisal of the amount the American people are willing and able to contribute to such a program, on the assumption that it will be applied currently to the entire population over a certain specified age. This, I think, should be a matter more for the unbiased interviewer than for the social worker or social planner who would be apt to begin such an undertaking with very preconceived ideas as to public desires, both as to the receipt of funds and the expenditure of them.

Fundamentally, of course, such a survey should be made by a bipartisan group, not addicted to any specific program but sufficiently conscious of the need for some reasonable and intelligent assistance. I think that such men can and should be found.

I hesitate to write on a subject on which I am comparatively uninformed and have developed ideas only as a sort of bystander in the field of social insurance. I am really regretful that more specific plans and ideas as to the personnel which might implement such a study are not within my grasp, but I want you to be assured that I thoroughly concur in your feelings and would willingly help in any way that I can to bring about the approach you so ably recommend.

I should like to suggest that Mr. Allen B. Thompson, vice president and actuary of the Associated Hospital Service of New York, New York City, from his wide experience in the Blue Cross and Blue Shield field, and Mr. Max S. Bell, vice president of Continental American Life Insurance Co., Wilmington, Del., might offer you some worth-while suggestions.

Sincerely,

H. V. MAYBEE,
Managing Director.

WOODMEN ACCIDENT CO.,

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Thank you for writing me as you did on May 15 regarding the social-security bill, H. R. 6000, on which a report will shortly be rendered by the Senate Finance Committee. We have followed the development of this legislation both in the House and during the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee and are in complete accord with your conclusion that H. R. 6000, if passed or enacted with the amendments proposed by the Senate Finance Committee, would constitute nothing more nor less than a perpetuation of the unsound existent system. You are undoubtedly familiar with the minority report of Representative CARL CURTIS, who is a member of the House Ways and Means Committee. Mr. CURTIS represents the First Nebraska District and I am one of his constituents. I am in complete accord with Mr. CURTIS' conclusion and the position which Senator BUTLER, of Nebraska, has taken in regard to this legislation.

You have summarized the situation, as I see it, when you state that "patching up the present unworkable social-security program will create more maladjustments than it cures." If we accept the notion that the Government must provide some benefits for the aged and the indigent, certainly common sense dictates that the whole social-security situation be surveyed in an objective manner by people who can bring a disinterested point of view to bear on the problem. As you well know, it is most unlikely that such objectivity can be found in the Federal security agencies. I heartily endorse the study that you propose. I hope that Congress in its good judgment will vote such a survey and will delay taking any action on amending the present system until the results of such a study are available. I believe that competent personnel who do not have an ax to grind can be found to conduct such a study. Their objectives should be to determine to what extent the Government should accept responsibility for the aged, the orphaned, and the widowed, and by what means provision can be made for them. Certainly in a time when the economy of the country is strained by the necessity of carrying on a cold war it is folly to heap additional heavy burdens upon the taxpayer in order to indulge in reckless social experimentation. You are to be congratulated upon your courage in taking the position that you have in this matter.

Cordially yours,

E. J. FAULKNER,
President.

THE NATIONAL UNDERWRITER CO.,
Chicago, Ill., May 22, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Committee on Public Works,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAIN: For a variety of personal and business reasons, I have not been able to give the kind of attention to replying to your May 11 letter propounding social security questions that it deserves.

I am complimented by your inquiry and I only wish that I could offer some helpful suggestions. In general I find that I concur in your thesis and especially do favor the idea of a thoroughgoing study of the whole social-security system and theory. There is, I believe, no urgency for legislation today; there are no great and reasonable wants that cry for satisfaction at this moment. Moreover as time goes on, the evidence of experience may point strongly in one direction or another. Hence the kind of study that you envisage can be afforded and would be a wise plan.

The make-up of the commission would be all-important. It could very well embrace men with capacity to understand the whole of a problem and with intuitive and imaginative qualities, but who have not been deeply involved with social-security matters. It would presumably be necessary to include individuals representing various elements of the population and with considerable social-security background. But to get together simply a group of men who have been more or less living with this problem for the past 10 or 15 years, I think would accomplish little.

Necessarily these men have developed attitudes that are more or less frozen and they may have a record of consistency to maintain, they may cling to answers that were good on the evidence of 10 years ago but are questionable today. What would be good would be a balance between men steeped in this thing and men with the capacity to come to grips with such a monumental problem but without serious prior exposure to it.

While I do not have any specific names to suggest, it occurs to me that the places to look for those with the desired endowments are on the bench, among churchmen and college presidents (perhaps freshly retired), I think I would depart from your specifications as to the type of commissioner wanted to the extent of deemphasizing "informed in this area" at least insofar as some of the members are concerned. It is my observation that the best informed in this area are the most dogmatic, the least disposed to take a fresh look, to permit factors other than those to which they are wedded to circulate in their consciousness. That is entirely human and natural and a product of age. I remember that advisers in setting up the system originally in 1935, very shortly saw the mistake of too slavish copying of the private insurance reserve principle in the field of public pensions, and they had not become too brittle to change direction. Today that same group, I think could hardly be expected to read the signs so clearly and change direction so readily. These informed men would bring attitudes, facts, opinions, background and history to the council table, but it seems to me that there is a place for men who can evaluate all this welter of viewpoint, who can see a problem, simplify it, project the answers into the future and come forth with a crystal-clear analysis.

Your letter is proof of your statesmanlike approach to this bewildering problem and it deserves a far more penetrating reply than I have been able to give. It is perfectly clear that there are no absolute principles in this field that are clearly apparent today and you are most assuredly on firm ground in advocating as today's step, a superior type of study.

You have my very best wishes.

Faithfully yours,

LEVERING CARTWRIGHT.

SEATTLE, WASH., May 22, 1950.

Hon. HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAIN: It is encouraging to know that you have given such serious consideration to the character of our present social-security legislation and the various proposals to amend it. I find myself in complete agreement with your position, both with respect to the discriminations involved in our present social-security system and with respect to the folly of attempting to cure these discriminations by a patch-work job such as is proposed by H. R. 6000.

It seems to me that the fundamental misconception involved in the present social-security legislation is the idea that John Doe Citizen is saving through social-security taxes some money which will help him take care of his old age. What John Doe Citizen needs to understand is that the social-security taxes which he now pays are used for current Government expenses, including payments to those who are now eligible for social-security benefits. In turn, John Doe Citizen will get his social-security benefits, not from what he has saved during his working years, but from taxes paid by John Doe, Jr., and other taxpayers of future years. What he receives will not bear any relationship to what he paid in taxes.

The social-security law was originally conceived as a law which would provide subsistence benefits and the dollar benefits now in the law were determined in the light of the purchasing power of the dollar in 1939. As the value of our dollar changes, we can expect the amount of benefit to be changed from time to time so that it will continue to provide subsistence benefits. It is apparent that in the long run the benefit that John Doe Citizen will get will be much more dependent upon the changing value of our currency than upon John Doe's wage record.

It is wasteful, and therefore it is stupid, to build up a cumbersome record of wages for the millions of citizens who have come under the social-security system. Because the value of the dollar is not a fixed but a changeable thing, most of the wage records which have been accumulated will ultimately be useless.

It is foolish to build up two systems of providing subsistence benefits for older citizens; one which we call assistance, and give only to those who can prove that they are in need, the other we call insurance, because those who are in the insured group have paid a special tax. The contradictions of the dual system are pointed up by the fact that many persons eligible for the insurance benefit claim the assistance benefit because it is greater.

When it comes to specific suggestions as to personnel I naturally think first of those in my own profession who have been concerned with the technical problems of insurance, annuities, and pensions. I would particularly suggest the following:

W. R. Williamson, 3400 Fairhill Drive, Washington, D. C. Mr. Williamson was actuarial consultant for the Social Security Board during the first 10 years that this law has been in effect. He has probably given more serious thought to the fundamental problems of this law than any other man in this country. He is currently senior actuarial consultant to the Wyatt Co., a firm of consulting actuaries and pension consultants.

Joseph B. Maclean, Yarmouth Port, Mass. Mr. Maclean was formerly vice president and actuary of Mutual Life Insurance Co. of New York and is a past president of the Actuarial Society. He is the author of the well-known reference book Life Insurance. While Mr. Maclean is now retired he is carrying on an independent consulting practice and is a man of considerable vigor and exceptional competence.

Thomas A. Phillips, chairman of the board, Minnesota Mutual Life Insurance Co., St. Paul, Minn. Mr. Phillips is a past president of the American Institute of Actuaries. I believe that his present company duties are such that he can spend a considerable amount of time on a project such as the one we are now talking about.

The following men are all of outstanding competence in the professional field and have given considerable attention to social-security problems. However, most of them have substantial executive and administrative responsibilities in their companies and it might be difficult for them to arrange to devote the proper amount of time to such a commission as you propose:

Edmund M. McConney, president, Bankers Life Co., Des Moines, Iowa. Mr. McConney is now president of the Society of Actuaries. (This is the main professional body representing life-insurance actuaries on this continent and was organized last year as a consolidation of the Actuarial Society and the American Institute of Actuaries.)

R. D. Murphy, executive vice president and actuary, Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York and a former president of the Actuarial Society.

M. Albert Linton, president, Provident Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia, Pa., and a former president of the Actuarial Society.

R. A. Hohaus, actuary, Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., New York, N. Y., and a former president of the American Institute of Actuaries.

A. J. McAndless, president, Lincoln National Life Insurance Co., Fort Wayne, Ind., and a past president of the American Institute of Actuaries.

Henry Beers, vice president, Aetna Life Insurance Co., Hartford, Conn.

Ronald G. Stagg, president, Northwestern National Life Insurance Co., Minneapolis, Minn., and vice president of the Society of Actuaries.

Clarence Tookey, actuarial vice president, Occidental Life Insurance Co. of California, Los Angeles, Calif., and vice president of the Society of Actuaries.

What I have said above merely repeats thoughts which obviously have occurred to you and to other legislators who have bothered to look behind the form of our present social-security laws to their substance. The arguments for a thoroughgoing revision of those laws have been forcibly set forth by Representative CARL CURTIS in his minority report on H. R. 6000.

You have asked for my views on the objectives, personnel and method of study which might be employed by a commission to make a fundamental study of the social-security program. The problems that such a commission would have to face would be very broad and I have not had an opportunity to give the matter much thought. However, for what they are worth, here are some views on the subject:

OBJECTIVES

The assignment of this problem to a commission should make it clear that the fundamental objective of the present social-security system, namely, the provision of an economic floor of protection for all citizens of the Nation, is to be preserved. However, the Commission should be empowered to explore possible alternative systems for accomplishing this objective. The Commission's work should include the following:

1. It should examine the present system from the standpoint of the ability of the Nation to carry out in the future the promises which the social-security legislation makes to our citizens today;

2. It should examine the relationship between the old-age-insurance program and the old-age-assistance program, with particular reference to the equity or inequity of treatment of citizens in different classes, such as the present aged who are eligible only for old-age-assistance benefits, the present aged who are eligible only for some old-age-insurance benefits, those who are eligible for either, and those who are not eligible for either one, the self-employed, the worker who shifts from covered employment to uncovered employment, or the reverse, and finally the employed taxpayer in uncovered employment;

3. If the Commission finds the present system to be defective or inadequate it should be authorized to recommend whatever revisions it finds most appropriate.

METHOD AND PERSONNEL

Such a commission should be composed of persons whose training and ability are such that their recommendations can be expected to be satisfactory to all political factions. This is perhaps an ideal which cannot be attained in our present political atmosphere. Nonetheless, the Commission should be composed primarily of persons who will seek and accept facts regardless of whether or not they agree with their preconceived ideas, and who will form independent judgments from those facts. It should contain persons who would command the confidence and the respect of the leaders of both major parties. It should have a staff drawn from sources outside the Social Security Administration but this staff should have the power to call upon staff of the Social Security Administration for any assistance or information.

I assume that any such commission should have representatives from other fields including educators, scientists, businessmen, and labor leaders, perhaps even some economists. You are probably much better equipped than I to suggest names of people in these fields who would be suitable and available.

There is an ever-widening realization of the unsatisfactory character of our present social-security legislation and a commission such as you suggest could be very valuable in hastening the day when the necessary fundamental revisions will be made. If there is anything which I can do to be helpful to you in your efforts to this end, please feel free to call on me.

Sincerely,

WENDELL A. MILLIMAN,
Consulting Actuary.

SOUTHWESTERN LIFE INSURANCE CO.,
Dallas, Tex., May 23, 1950.

The Honorable HARRY P. CAIN,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I feel greatly honored that you should write to me as you did on the 11th of May. There was some delay in the mailing of your letter because it was not received in Dallas until the 18th.

For your convenience I recite my professional qualifications. I became a fellow of the Faculty of Actuaries of Scotland by examination in the year 1909. I am a past president of the American Institute of Actuaries.

I am very sympathetic to your proposal that the most important subject of social security should be exhaustively investigated by an independent committee. If such a committee is organized I think it would be most appropriate to call upon the president of the Society of Actuaries for recommendation of such members of that society as, in the opinion of the president, are experienced and capable of cooperation on a matter of great national interest.

Personally I am sympathetic to social security. I favor the establishment of social security on a pay-as-you-go basis. I recommend that basis because it will avoid the accumulation of great reservoirs of capital which would inevitably become the target for attack.

It is manifest that without in any way destroying the individual initiative that has made the United States of America a great country, there is a place for minimum benefits established by the Federal Government. I draw your particular attention to the fact that I say "minimum benefits." We should not be unmindful of the great progress that has taken place in recent years in public health, surgical skill, and medical care. These changes have promoted a vast increase in the expectation of life.

As a result of the great change that has taken place in the expectation of life there is a growing disproportion between retired workers and productive workers. Care should be taken that we do not saddle industry and the productive worker with a burden that many years from now might compel a retreat that would be deeply embarrassing to the Federal Government.

I am indeed sympathetic to your comment on old-age assistance within the several States supported by Federal subsidies.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR COBURN,
Vice President.

LIBERTY LIFE AND ACCIDENT ASSOCIATION,
Muskegon, Mich., May 22, 1950.

HON. HARRY P. CAIN,
The United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: I have before me a copy of the letter which you addressed to Mr. C. O. Pauley, managing director, Health and Accident Underwriters Conference, under date of May 15, 1950. As a professional actuary and as a private citizen, I am tremendously pleased to learn of your critically intelligent attitude on the above legislation.

Just as long as we have the present framework of the social-security system under which new promises of increased benefits—always on a deferred basis—we will be drawing closer and closer to ultimate disillusionment under which those have contributed the most will receive the greatest disappointment.

I do wish I knew of some way to express my feelings on this subject more effectively so that as a nation we would face the problem of care for the aged on a basis that would be economically sound and stable.

Respectfully yours,

W. H. MACCURDY,
Vice President and Secretary.

WEST NEWTON, MASS., May 15, 1950.

Senator HARRY P. CAIN,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAIN: Thank you very much for your letter of May 12.

There is enclosed herewith a copy of a letter which I wrote to Senators LODGE and SALTONSTALL in regard to H. R. 6000. You will note that my views correspond almost exactly with yours.

There is also enclosed a copy of a letter which I sent to Senators LODGE, SALTONSTALL, and MCCLELLAN as chairman of the Subcommitte on National Legislation of the Massachusetts Medical Society. You will note that this letter concerns itself with the medical aspects of H. R. 6000 and sets out our opposition to a Federal program of permanent total disability compensation.

In regard to a committee to study the problem, I was impressed by General Eisenhower's suggestion made before the New York Herald Tribune Forum that a group of outstanding experts in the field of social and economic problems be convened at Columbia University. While he did not go into detail in regard to the composition of such a group, my own inclination would be to exclude from participation those persons who are intimately associated with the Federal Security Agency and therefore have an ax to grind. You will recall that in the investigations carried on to date employees or former employees of the Federal Security Agency have played a dominant role behind the scenes. Any future investigations should avoid the possibility of this kind of criticism.

If I can be of any further assistance to you, please do not hesitate to get in touch with me.

Cordially,

CHARLES G. HAYDEN, M. D.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I should like at this time to speak briefly in general support of H. R. 6000.

There are and will be pending, as the Senate knows, many amendments to the pending social-security measure. Most amendments, I understand, will be directed toward liberalizing the bill reported out by the Senate Finance Committee. I shall be inclined to support most of the amendments directed toward this end. I have introduced and joined with others in sponsoring some of these amendments. I shall speak on them again when they are called up next Thursday.

Before discussing amendments, however, I should like to make clear that in my opinion the Senate Finance Committee has done an outstanding job with this complex and difficult piece of legislation. The committee as a whole has shown a forward-looking attitude toward the problem, and the committee chairman, the senior Senator from Georgia, has earned the thanks and admiration of all of us in this great work which he has directed so skillfully and thoroughly.

The liberalization of the benefits in some categories and the extension of coverage in the Senate bill—while not as wide as I should like to see them—are long steps in the right direction.

It is comforting to realize that in this debate the question is not whether we should have social security. That is now accepted in principle by almost all of us.

It is to be recalled, however, that when the first social-security measures were originally proposed in 1935, violent opposition was offered both in the Congress of the United States and the Legislature of New York State, of which I was Governor at that time. Perhaps some may recall that in the Presidential election of 1936, the party on the other side of the aisle argued that social security was regimentation—that awful word—and that the American people were soon to be required to wear dog tags as a result of having social-security numbers. Happily that argument is now gathering dust in the attic of poltical discards.

Today the question is how much social security we should have and can afford and what is the best method for extending social security to as wide a sector of the population as possible. I congratulate those of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who have come to this advanced position. At this point my argument with them is one of degree and not of kind.

Today I appeal to the Senate to liberalize the present measure—not merely to approve it. Today I speak to my colleagues in behalf not only of a social-security program but of a broadened social-security program—a program broadened beyond even the limits set forth in the Senate bill.

I cannot presume to be the administration spokesmen on this subject, but I think I speak the mind and will of the administration and of the intent of the Democratic platform—certainly of the platform on which I ran last year—when I say that the liberalization of the social-security program is our mandate from the people. That mandate is not only for the pending bill but for the liberalizing amendments which have been introduced.

Amendments which I and other Senators have sponsored would extend coverage to 2,000,000 more people than would be covered under the pending bill. Approximately 1,000,000 of these would be domestics, the group that possibly needs social-security coverage more than any other. One additional million would be agricultural workers.

One liberalizing amendment would increase the average benefit under the OASI program from an over-all average of $49 proposed in the Senate bill to an average of $55. Moreover, it would increase the maximum amount which could be obtained by an individual who has made his contributions for 5 years from the proposed level of $72.50 to a new level of $100—and for an individual who has worked and contributed for 20 years, to a maximum of $114.

In view of our present standard and cost of living, this is not a princely pension. It is only barely enough for a person to live at a self-respecting level and to maintain his health.

I recognize, of course, that the Senate bill is a vast improvement over the present law in this respect. The Senate bill proposes an over-all average benefit of $49 compared to the average of $26 provided under present law. Obviously, the present benefits have no relation to reality. That is best illustrated by the fact that the over-all average public-assistance grant to the needy aged in 1949—the so-called pension to the aged who have made no contributions—was $45, or almost $20 more than is now provided under the insurance system. I want to emphasize that to be eligible for these public-assistance aids, the so-called pensions, the aged individuals involved must pass a means test, must take a pauper's oath.

In many States today, including my own, these public-assistance payments to the needy aged are far higher not only than the benefits now available under the Federal insurance program, but, in some cases, higher even than those now proposed under the Senate bill. This disparity between a system based on insurance savings and a system based on outright grants to the needy must be wiped out. The emphasis must be transferred to the insurance system. The insurance system must be made more attractive than public assistance to the needy.

Even the average $49 pension proposed by the Senate bill is woefully inadequate, and lacks the essential element of recognition of the length of time during which the individual has contributed, and also fails to accept as a base for taxation a sufficiently high wage level. It does not recognize the fact that the monetary wage level of our working population has doubled in the past 10 years. The liberalizing amendments which will be proposed on the floor take cognizance of these real changes in the national situation.

Another vital liberalizing amendment would provide disability insurance on the same principle as that approved by the House. This provision might be expected to add approximately 500,000 people to the pension rolls by 1960. The average pension would be about $50 per month—certainly not an overgenerous amount. Still other liberalizing amendments would increase Federal grants for special assistance; yet other amendments would extend public assistance to Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, and thus honor our commitments to the people of those dependent Territories.

One further amendment would help finance more adequate medical care for the needy. The Advisory Council on Social Security recommended such a provision.

I know that there are some who will say that these measures are impractical or that they are luxuries which we cannot afford. My answer is simple: These are not luxuries but investments in the security and welfare of our people. These investments will earn for our Nation a liberal return in increased contentment and increased productivity.

This, I take it, is the object of the social-security program.

The able and scholarly senior Senator from Ohio may say that with these liberalizing amendments, we are providing for increased payments out of the social-security fund while making no provisions for increased payments into the social-security fund.

It is estimated that if all the amendments I have referred to are adopted, the increased cost to the fund over the projected period, which means until the year 2000, will be approximately 1½ percent of payroll.

I wish to say that in my judgment, after studying the experience of the past many years, I am convinced that a dynamic and expanding economy, and our steadily rising wage pattern will provide the increased collections which the increased expenditures will require. That has been our experience in the past; I am sure that will be our experience in the future. In my judgment there is no reason to increase the present schedule of social-security taxes beyond that already provided. If the need should arise, however, I would be perfectly willing to increase the tax schedule when that time comes.

At this point I should like to take a quick look backward and examine for a moment just what it is we are talking about when we talk about social security.

It might be worth while to recall that the quest for security is one of the most ancient in the history of mankind. Security against aggression and security against the natural hazards of life, of sickness, of old age, of drought, and of famine have been sought by men in various ways since the first dawn of time. As soon as people first developed the art of communal living, they took their first steps toward social security in its broadest sense.

External aggression being the greatest threat to security in ancient days, towns were built with great walls for purposes of security, armies and navies were assembled for security, constabularies and police departments were organized for security. In organizing these measures for security, the whole people were taxed in order to provide security for those who required it.

Later, when the need for financial security and health security gained recognition along with the need for security from theft and aggression, banks, insurance companies, and hospitals were organized for the security of individuals and of groups of individuals. The demand for security is neither new nor revolutionary. It is as old as man himself.

The fact that the present emphasis is on governmentally provided security against the hazards of sickness, unemployment, and old age merely recognizes the increasing complexity of society and the advancing status of our concept of social obligations. We now recognize that human life, itself, is a precious national resource. We realize that the conservation of that resource against the extraordinary hazards of twentieth-century existence is an essential function of government and is, indeed—as I have said—an investment in the material welfare of the Nation.

Today we all accept this fact, although some may not publicly acknowledge it. Political conservatives as well as liberals have certainly reached agreement on the desirability of social security. It has passed out of the realm of political controversy. Of course, there are still some few exceptions. There are some individuals who would, if they could, turn back the clock to another age. I doubt whether this point of view has any significant representation in this body.

Today we discuss the extent of social security, the exact amount of the benefits, and the specific groups which can be covered, and how to guarantee that the money will be available in the future when the swelling fraction of our population over the age of 65 reaches such proportions that the aged would be an unmanageable burden on the revenue resources of the Nation, unless provided for in an insurance system such as this.

By 1990, the percentage of our population over 65 it is estimated will be 13.2 percent, and the liabilities of the old-age trust fund will be of such a magnitude—and constantly growing—that unless some reserves are built up now, the national economy may have a liability which cannot be practicably met out of budgetary appropriations.

That is the reason for this insurance system, rather than for a straight universal pension system supported entirely by current Government revenues. I would like to see our old-age system enlarged now, and all the 11,500,000 of our aged covered under the system. I favor universal old-age coverage. This must and will be soon provided. That will be our next step.

Meanwhile, however, I think our public-assistance grants should be liberalized, but the insurance system should keep pace, in order that benefits based on earnings and contributions may in the not too distant future replace public-assistance grants altogether.

These are general goals. These are problems to be worked out. We must beware, however, of those who would call a halt to the insurance system, and to improvements in it, pending another study. Studies designed to delay action rather than to enlighten action are the most deadly device in the arsenal of the opponents of progress.

We debate today on the amount and kind of public assistance to extend through grants-in-aid to States and to Territories for their welfare activities for children, for the needy aged, and for the health of the people.

All these programs are part of the pattern of the welfare state. I need not tell my colleagues in the Senate that I am for the welfare state. The people, too, are for the welfare state. But some of my colleagues are inclined to confuse the concept of the welfare state with the conflict over Federal-State authority. They are afraid of federalization and say that they favor welfare activities by government, but only by State governments and not by the Federal Government.

I shall not enter into this argument today. But I want to point out that in the field of social security, the Federal Government, under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, has a mandate to serve the people. If this can best be done by direct Federal action, it must be so done. If it can best be done through the States, that should be done. But to block action by insisting that the Federal Government may not provide for the general welfare in the field of social security because this is properly a State function is to deny our essential responsibilities and to fail the people in their basic needs.

While we weigh and debate the best method of accomplishing what we seek, we must remember that we are "one Nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all." That is what we say in our Pledge of Allegiance. That is what we must justify by action on the pending bill, and on the pending amendments to liberalize that bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, there has come to my attention in recent years a deeply disturbing observation. People are saying that we are so far along the road to statism that we cannot possibly turn back, and so we might as well make the best of it. This, of course, is the most malicious nonsense.

If we are on the wrong road—and statism is the antithesis of democracy—then we must reorient ourselves. But we do not have to waste time going back. Far better, we can cut a new trail across country until we reach the right road off which we wandered.

Mr. President, it is because I sincerely believe that the road we are traveling in regard to social security is leading us away from American ideals and toward ultimate national insecurity and disaster, that I am voting against H. R. 6000.

However, I do not advocate standing still, much less going back. On the contrary, I am offering you a new concrete proposal for a pay-as-you-go, full coverage social-security program which would give more protection to more Americans than H. R. 6000 and spell security rather than insecurity for our national economy.

The bad features of our present Social Security Act—and H. R. 6000 would in the main simply multiply them—these bad features fall into two broad categories: First, inhumanities, injustices, and undemocratic discriminations; and second, economic unsoundness.

So-called social security has been with us now for 15 years. Back in 1935, weary and discouraged from depression, many believed the promises then made by President Roosevelt that the magic formula of contributory, deferred-payment, social insurance would free us from the fear of poverty in old age. The Nation did not examine carefully who was in and who was out—but passed the Social Security Act confident that, by virtue of compulsory contributions, it was purchasing, in a dignified manner, adequate retirement pensions. There would be no more poorhouses; no more public charity; no more of the humiliation and grief of the means test.

Now, after 15 years, what do we find?

Out of our 11,500,000 men and women over 65, only around 2,000,000 are receiving OASI benefits as a right; and of these, 250,000 are forced to undergo the means test to qualify for supplementary local public assistance because their OASI benefits are insufficient. Two million seven hundred thousand who have not qualified for OASI—although many of them may have several years of contributions—are on public assistance with all the indignity that that implies. And over 6,500,000, not qualified for OASI and too proud to apply for assistance, receive neither the one nor the other. Many of them may be as worthy as those selected for the former and as needy as those subjected to the latter. In addition, according to the Bureau of the Census, the largest single group of these 6,500,000 forgotten old folks are widows who are not working and whose incomes range from $1,000 all the way down to zero.

In short, after 15 years, out of some 11,500,000 men and women over 65, we have only around 2,000,000 receiving insurance benefits and the rest—over 9,000,000—receiving public assistance or nothing.

Is this security or is it sand in our eyes?

Certainly it is not what we bargained for; it is not what the people of this country want; and it is not what they expect Congress to give them. If the honest people of America really understood the restrictions and discriminations implicit in H. R. 6000 and there would be a referendum on the subject, I feel sure they would vote, as I will, against it.

H. R. 6000 discriminates against the present 9,500,000 OASI-excluded aged who cannot be brought in under the employee insurance formula.

My program, on the other hand, awards them immediate protection.

H. R. 6000 discriminates against all OASI ineligibles. To them it says: "If you are in need, declare yourself a pauper, prove you have no assets, no close relatives who might be made to support you. Open your books. Let a paid social worker snoop around and look under the rug to see that you have nothing hidden. Then as a public ward you will be sent a check made up partly of State and local taxes, partly of Federal taxes. But if you should have the luck to earn a few dollars, you will be cut off and run the risk of losing your place on the list."

My program wipes out the pauper's test forever and guarantees recipients the dignity of a pension. Under my program no social worker will darken their doors.

H. R. 6000 discriminates shamelessly against those unlucky OASI contributors who fall a fraction of a quarter short of insured status. As of January 1, 1950, for the 80,400,000 men and women who had contributed to OASI since the beginning only 43,700,000 had fully insured status. It is true that H. R. 6000 would extend eligibility to a few hundred thousand of the present aged, former OASI contributors—but only a few. Even so, for the future, H. R. 6000 still would cut people off from benefits entirely if catastrophe struck and if they missed their required number of quarters. In other words, the social-security system would remain a lottery system under this bill.

My program is free of all such capricious juggling of formulas and funds. Under my program the only qualifications are age and state of income.

H. R. 6000 would discourage elderly individuals from working, and so would reduce over-all production. Even under the new amendments if a man should earn $51 a month or more he would be cut off from all benefits. At the same time, he would be permitted as much unearned income as he pleased, without reducing his benefits by a single dollar.

My program puts no premium on idleness. Under my program a man can continue to work without being cut off from his pension entirely.

H. R. 6000 would exclude from OASI privileges some fifteen to twenty million of the gainfully employed—among whom are those most likely to be in need, such as marginal workers in domestic service, migratory farm labor, share croppers, and so forth.

My program would cover every American citizen.

H. R. 6000 would hand windfalls to retired bank presidents, and would supply less than enough to live on to old folks in the lower wage brackets. Although benefits would be increased between 85 and 110 percent, the poor fellow now drawing an OASI benefit of $10 a month would have that benefit increased only to $20—still not enough to meet the increased cost of groceries.

My program would leave no aged American with an inadequate income.

Under H. R. 6000, it would be possible for a man of 65 to qualify for benefits at the bottom of the ladder, with 6 quarters and a total contribution of $4.50. For this $4.50, if he retired immediately after his 6 quarters he would receive a primary benefit of $20 a month for the rest of his days. If his wife were the same age, with the usual life expectancy of 13 years for him and 15 for her, they would net for that original $4.50 investment. $4,826. However, a 65-year-old man earning $3,000 or over, would do even better. Under the same set of circumstances, he and his wife might expect to receive $17,373 worth of handouts from Uncle Sam—quite a nice prize. These figures that I have quoted are conservative estimates; and under particular circumstances, such as when there are a greater number of dependents and more years of life, the windfalls would come much higher.

What a contrast between this situation and that of the aged widow who receives absolutely nothing because her deceased husband barely missed acquiring sufficient quarters of coverage.

My program holds no such unjust, undemocratic, un-American distinction.

Now let us consider the economic aspects of H. R. 6000.

In the first place, OASI is not an insurance at all in the actuarial sense. This is readily understandable when a comparison is made between the total contributions and the windfall benefits of persons retiring during the first 20 years. Even with the rising payroll tax rate during the maturing years of the system, benefits far outstrip what the employee's contribution of tax would purchase actuarially. This means that other people must pay the actuarial margin of error. Not only is the employers' part of the tax passed on to the consumers in the form of higher prices, but the forfeitures of some contributors add to the windfall of others.

In addition, there is the question of what happens to the payroll taxes collected. Obviously the money cannot be kept safe and sound in a sack. It must, under law, be invested in Government obligations. The Government promptly spends the money, pays interest to itself from the taxpayers' pockets on the slips of paper in the Treasury and then, when these old-age-and-survivor-insurance I O U's fall due, must either float new bond issues or tax the people again to get the cash to pay benefits.

But by far the most dangerous element in the economics of H. R. 6000 is to be found in the rising costs of the dual old-age and survivors insurance—public-assistance system. OASI deferred payments increase precipitously as greater numbers retire on a high-benefit scale. If past performance is any indication of future trends, political pressures would continue to multiply the millions of Federal grants-in-aid for State and local public assistance.

Dr. H. G. Moulton, president of the Brookings Institution, in his preface to Cost and Financing of Social Security, by Lewis Meriam and Karl T. Schlotterbeck, declares:

> The old age and survivors insurance system in its present form involves constantly mounting costs over a 50-year period. Great confusion has been engendered in the public mind because of the assumption that these costs can be gradually provided for through the application of ordinary insurance principles. That is, it is widely believed that the social-security taxes now being paid furnish the resources from which the future benefits will be paid. The fact is that a practically universal governmental system cannot successfully apply the actuarial legal reserve devices of private, voluntary insurance systems. As the present system operates, no real reserve funds with which to meet future requirements are accumulated. The benefits will have to be paid out of future taxes.
> The future demands upon the Government for benefit payments—to be paid out of future taxes—will be so great that it appears to us essential that they be given full consideration now before the commitments are made. The demand for cash for benefits must be studied in the light of other governmental cash requirements for national defense, foreign relations, veterans benefits, interest on the public debt, and all other activities of Government.

The authors conclude with a recommendation for a true pay-as-you-go system under which persons now in need will have those needs met from current revenues.

Mr. President, during more than 3 months of public hearings and many weeks of executive session, the Senate Finance Committee labored to report Social Security Act amendments that would be fair and just to all Americans. However, we found that it was impossible to devise an OASI formula to make the present aged eligible for benefits or to cover those most likely to be in need—such as marginal domestics, migratory farm labor, and share croppers.

I strongly suspect that the majority of the Finance Committee is not only unhappy concerning the conglomerate amendments which have emerged, but, for reasons of justice and considerations of economy, would favor an honest pay-as-you-go social-security system. This is proven by the proposed committee resolution to set up a subcommittee specifically instructed to study pay-as-you-go systems.

During the hearings it became apparent that the opponents of the present system and of H. R. 6000 fall into three principal groups: First, those who would like to see a pay-as-you-go plan adopted, but who cling to the idea of contributions; second, those who wanted a pay-as-you-go, low, flat-rate floor of protection for all citizens without a means test; and third, those who believed, with the Brookings Institution, in pay-as-you-go protection for the aged, but on the basis of some kind of a means test, as the only system economically sound.

The proposal which I am about to outline is an attempt to incorporate in one universal-eligibility, pay-as-you-go social-security program the best features of these various points of view. That is: First, equal protection for all, under the law; second, freedom from the means test; third, universal contributions; and fourth, economic soundness: pay-as-you-go, go-as-you-pay, on an income-tax, income-supplement basis, for all aged persons and dependent children whose income or means of support drop below a given minimum.

In a nutshell, my program is a universal contributory social-security system, in the sense that everyone with income would pay a special, earmarked income tax to support it; and thus, at some period of his life every individual would be consciously contributing to his own future security.

It is pay as you go, in the sense that the receipts for any particular year would be roughly the amount necessary to pay the benefits for that year.

It is go as you pay, in the sense that we would be doing for the old people today exactly what we expect the young people of tomorrow to do for those past 65 in their time.

Here is the plan: Every American citizen, aged 65 and over, will be entitled to an individual citizen's pension under the following conditions:

Every American man or woman aged 65 or over, whose income for the year ahead on the estimated income declarations currently used for income-tax purposes, amounts to a figure under $600, will receive a citizen's pension of $50 a month, or $600 a year—that is, $100 a month for a man and his wife, both 65 or over.

Every American man or woman whose income amounts to $600 or over will receive a citizen's pension of $1 a month less for every $50 more of annual income. In other words, if his or her income amounts to between $600 and $650, he or she will receive a citizen's pension of $49 a month or $588 a year. If his or her income is between $650 and $700, he or she will receive a citizen's pension of $48 a month or $576 annually. And so on. The pension tapers off to zero at around $3,000, although the repeal of the present $600 special income-tax exemption for persons over 65 will not make it worth while to apply for pension after the $2,450 level. If this income changes during the course of the year, the pension rate also will be changed.

In principle, the same system will apply to dependent children. That is, inadequacies in means of support will be made up in benefits on a graduated scale.

As to financing, although, on pay-as-you-go, the special old-age and dependent children's tax rate will be determined by the current outgo, and vice versa, it is thought that to support the pension schedule indicated, the initial tax will be about 5 percent of the first $3,000 of individual income. However, this 5 percent will not be a net increase in taxes for the following reasons: First, the existing OASIS payroll tax will be repealed; second, the greater part of the present local taxes required to support the State public-assistance programs will be unnecessary; third, a reduction of about 2½ percent in the regular income-tax rates on the first $3,000 of individual income will probably be effected, in recognition of the fact that the new system will relieve the Federal Government of substantially over a billion dollars a year in grants-in-aid to States for public assistance. At the same time, it might prove wise to abolish the existing $600 personal income-tax exemption for individuals 65 and over.

The advantages of this program, like the disadvantages of H. R. 6000, fall into two primary categories: First, social, and, second, economic.

Taking the economic advantages first: My proposal would mean tremendous savings in costs over the committee bill. I have been supplied with a preliminary cost study on my proposal by Mr. George Immerwahr, former chief actuary for old-age and survivors insurance, a distinguished authority in this field. The concluding sentence of his memorandum is as follows:

> When allowance is made for these further savings, it seems conservative to state that the adoption of this proposal in lieu of H. R. 6000 would produce an ultimate saving of $5,000,000,000 a year.

Instead of the gigantic, pyramiding costs of H. R. 6000, which may either bankrupt the taxpayer or destroy the value of the dollar in the years to come, my proposal provides a system well within the ability of the taxpayer to carry.

I am inserting Mr. Immerwahr's brief memorandum in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Let me mention now the advantages of my proposal from the standpoint of the individual American, groups of Americans, and the Nation as a whole:

My proposal matches the equal opportunity of our American way of life with equal protection against loss of income in old age. It plays no favorite, offers no special privileges. It is just, nondiscriminatory, thoroughly American.

It assures every American, the richest as well as the poorest that if catastrophe strikes, he or she will be adequately provided for in old age. At the same time it puts the burden of responsibility on the individual to work and to save for his own old age and for his survivors.

It also makes the individual over 65 responsible for making an honest declaration of his income for the year ahead—just as now he is expected to make an honest income-tax return—and upon this declaration his citizen's pension is based. No investigation is anticipated beyond the usual Treasury sample check for fraud.

It frees every American from the fear of ever having to submit to the indignity of the means test in the event of income loss in old age. No one's neighbor will have to know whether Joe Doakes and his wife are receiving citizen's pensions—any more than the neighbors know the amount of income tax Joe Doakes now pays.

My proposal to abolish the means test will have a direct, immediate appeal for the approximately 3,000,000 present public-assistance recipients—not to mention any who might have to undergo the test in the foreseeable future.

My proposal to bring in the present aged will affect 6,500,000 persons, in addition to those 3,000,000 now on assistance.

My proposal for universal eligibility will affect 15 to 20 million farmers, sharecroppers, migratory farm labor, and marginal domestic servants.

My proposal to pay pensions on a graduated, income-loss basis will give more in pensions to greater numbers.

Organized labor will gain right down the line. It is true my proposal will reduce the over-all pensions of those few retired workers who hold a 25-year record of service with companies having no offset clause in their collective-bargaining pension contracts. However, it will give more to the vast majority of workers who are employed by small business and who change jobs every few years.

Farmers will approve my proposal as a guaranty of their traditional independence rather than in any way interfering with it. Rural areas generally will be emancipated from the oppression of public assistance.

State Governments will be relieved of a large share of their present financial outlay for public assistance. State funds will be freed for other necessary local developments, or for tax reduction.

The advantages of my program for the individual American, for important groups of Americans, and for the country as a whole, it seems to me, Mr. President, add up to an impressive total.

The 3,000,000 present aged on public assistance, the 6,500,000 present aged on neither OASI nor public assistance, plus the fiftten to twenty million of the gainfully employed who would remain uncovered by House bill 6000 amount to more than 25,000,000 Americans who will be benefited immediately by the adoption of my program.

Add to this the advantage to be won by the members of organized labor and by the farm population on top of the financial relief to State treasuries, and whom have we left against it? Those OASI contributors who might—but then might not—land a windfall. They are the only ones who would lose.

Mr. President, I am well aware that the change-over from one type of old-age security system to another will require the talents, time, and services of men of the caliber of the Hoover Commission.

Such a commission, for instance, will have to determine what do with the present OASI fund. It might be refunded to former contributors with interests in the form of bonds. It might be used for operations during the first year of the new system. It might also be held intact as an interest-bearing investment to cushion recession periods when incomes drop and appreciably more old people receive pensions.

Mr. President, to give the time and opportunity for such careful study as the committee already has recommended—to work out details of my proposal and to analyze and incorporate the best features of sundry other pay-as-you-go proposals, I am introducing as an amendment to House bill 6000, a stopgap measure of 2 years' duration.

This stopgap measure goes exactly as far as House bill 6000 in liberalizing eligibility requirements for the present aged. It increases benefits from the present $10 a month minimum to $25 minimum with a maximum of $50. Thus it goes further than House bill 6000 for the lowest benefit groups and, during the interim period, meets the demand of the increased cost of living for all present beneficiaries.

My amendment strikes out all of House bill 6000 after the enacting clause except the portion relating to the unemployment fund. However, if any titles thus struck out, such as "Aid to Dependent Children" and "Aid to the Needy Blind," should be considered necessary during the interim 2-year period of my bill, I shall be the first to ask that the difficulties be ironed out in conference.

If I might stress one final point: This stopgap bill of mine meets the real, immediate need as well as House bill 6000 is supposed to meet it. It takes care of the urgent requirements—the injustices resulting from the fall in the purchasing power of the dollar; and it matches House bill 6000 in correcting certain eligibility inequities.

I know that many Members of Congress promised their constituents to provide more liberally for the aged by broadening social security.

This stopgap measure of mine goes as far as does House bill 6000 in providing immediate relief. My proposal for a universal-eligibility pay-as-you-go system provides more protection for more Americans on a more equitable, more democratic basis.

A vote for House bill 6000 would be a vote to multiply and perpetuate the injustices of our present system, for after the windfalls are once increased it would be many years before it would be possible to make constructive changes. A vote for House bill 6000 would also be a vote against the 9,500,000 old folks of today and the fifteen to twenty million of the gainfully employed who will never be eligible for benefits under this bill.

A vote for my stopgap measure is a way to make good on our promises—to offer hope to 25,000,000 more Americans.

Mr. President, I offer my full-eligibility, pay-as-you-go social-security program as an indication of the way to reach the American road, and I ask support from my colleagues on both sides of the aisle for my stopgap measure to give us the time necessary to reach that road.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I should like to insert in the RECORD at this point in my remarks a comparison of costs of the Butler proposal with those of House bill 6000.

There being no objection, the comparison of costs was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COMPARISON OF COSTS OF THE BUTLER PROPOSAL WITH THOSE OF H. R. 6000

The proposal to pay a general benefit of $50 a month to all persons over 65 without a needs test, the benefit amount to be reduced or eliminated for persons who (according to their income tax returns) are in the higher income brackets (and to be made subject to offset for various other Federal pensions) has a distinctly higher cost than H. R. 6000 in the immediate years but results in an ultimate cost saving. The following table shows the estimated benefit costs of the proposal as compared with those of H. R. 6000, using for both the intermediate-cost assumptions used in the committee report on H. R. 6000. Use was also made of data re income of the aged, released by the Census Bureau, and appropriately adjusted to fit in with the conditions of the proposal. In the table, the proposal is extended to provide $35 benefits for orphan children.

[Money figures in billions]

Year	Gross benefit costs under Butler proposal			Corresponding benefit costs under H. R. 6000
	Old age	Children	Total	Old age	All other	Total
1951	$4.6	$0.5	$5.1	$1.6	$0.5	$2.1
1955	5.1	.5	5.6	2.1	.6	2.7
1960	5.7	.5	6.2	3.0	.7	3.7
1980	7.2	.5	7.7	6.9	.8	7.7
2000	8.4	.5	8.9	10.0	.9	10.9

The above comparison is only partial, as it fails to take account of the Federal cost savings resulting from the elimination of Federal grants for OAA (old-age assistance) and ADC (aid to dependent children) and also of the fact that the administrative costs under H. R. 6000 would be largely eliminated under the proposal. The following table shows the net change in Federal costs when allowance is made for these factors.

[Money figures in billions]

Year	Increase of cost due to benefit payments only	Decrease in cost due to saving in administrative expenses	Decrease in Federal cost due to elimination of OAA and ADC	Net change in Federal cost
1951	$3.0	(1)	$1.1	+$1.9
1955	2.9	(1)	1.3	+1.6
1960	2.5	$0.1	1.4	+1.0
1980	----------	.1	1.2	−1.3
2000	−2.0	.2	1.0	−3.2

[1] Less than $50,000,000.

But even this latter table does not tell the full story. It fails to show the various Federal tax gains under this proposal, such as that resulting from the taxability of benefits and the denial of the double exemption to those older people who accept the benefits. It fails to show the savings to the States, whose assistance costs, though not eliminated like those of the Federal Government, will be at least reduced. Most important of all, it does not take account of the large savings that will result from the avoidance of overliberalization of Federal benefits far beyond the level of H. R. 6000, an overliberalization which is inevitable when we operate under a deferred-benefit system like that of H. R. 6000, with which it is so easy to yield to political pressures for benefit liberalization, since the structure of the system conceals its real costs.

When allowance is made for these further savings, it seems conservative to state that the adoption of this proposal in lieu of H. R. 6000 would produce an ultimate saving of $5,000,000,000 a year.

GEORGE E. IMMERWAHR,
Former Chief Actuary for Old-Age and Survivors' Insurance, Social Security Administration.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now stand in recess until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, June 19, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate June 16 (legislative day of June 7), 1950:

FOREIGN ASSISTANCE ADMINISTRATION

Milton Katz, of Massachusetts, to be the United States special representative in Europe, with the rank of Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary, pursuant to title I of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948.

SENATE

MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, June 7, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. F. Norman Van Brunt, associate minister, Foundry Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God our Father, in whom all generations have found their dwelling place, in whom our glorious Nation found its birth, we come to Thee as representatives of the people in this moment, pausing at the beginning of this day to take our place with the men of the ages who have stood under the shadow of the Almighty and in faith have upheld the principles of freedom as divine rights which Thou didst give to man.

Give unto us, we beseech Thee, strength for service, devotion to duty, and the courage of our convictions, strength that goes on when service seems to lose its glamour; devotion that endures when duty becomes a drudgery; courage when causes that are caustic cross with that which we know to be morally right.

In these days of tremendous decisions grant us to know that underneath are the everlasting arms, lasting, yea everlasting, holding us up and upholding the principles of freedom and dignity which our democracy embodies.

Help us to know and to understand that Thy purposes and laws endure and prevail. May we so cut the patterns of our minds that, with patience, we might fit into the eternal scheme of things. If we become feverish or full of haste, breathe through the heats of our desires Thy coolness and Thy balm.

We pray in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

By unanimous consent, the following routine business was transacted:

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 187)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation, in the amount of $1,928,000, for the District of Columbia, fiscal year 1951, in the form of an amendment to the budget, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION WITH PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—RESOLUTION OF NEENAH (WIS.) KIWANIS CLUB

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I have received from Earl De Long, secretary of the Kiwanis Club, of Neenah, Wis. The resolution pertains to the very critical question of Government competition with private enterprise, competition which is growing heavier with each day. Moreover, in each passing day of Congress' session, more and more bills are being introduced, the net effect of which is to place Government more and more into competition with its own private citizens.

The Kiwanis Club's resolution suggests a constitutional amendment to prohibit such competition. There are many who will doubt that such a constitutional amendment would be feasible, particularly in view of the fact that the Government is already up to its ears in this competition. However, there will be no thinking person, I believe, who will doubt the fact that the Kiwanis Club resolution touches upon a very crucial problem of modern-day America.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the resolution be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas America is the product of a people's faith in constitutional law designed to protect the property and enterprises of each citizen from political competition or confiscation; and

Whereas attacks upon this principle have produced many governmental agencies which are now in active conflict with the individual enterprises of the American people; and

Whereas many proposals now before Congress, will, if adopted by a mere majority, further jeopardize the rights of the American people to their individual property and enterprises; and

Whereas the intent and purpose of the tenth amendment to the Constitution was to prohibit governmental exercise of powers not specifically delegated to it; and

Whereas the intention of the fifth article of the Constitution was to provide a means for the proper delegation of powers to Government through a procedure which requires a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Congress and the approval of three-quarters of the States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Kiwanis Club of Neenah, Inc., in regular session assembled this 2d day of June 1950, exercise our constitutional power to petition the Congress to preserve the intent and purposes of the Constitution by initiating an amendment to the Constitution, for submission to the people of the various States, to provide that the Government of the United States shall not engage in any business, professional, commercial, or industrial enterprise in competition with its citizens except as specified in the Constitution.

In witness whereof, I have hereto affixed my signature as secretary of said Kiwanis Club of Neenah, Inc., this 7th day of June 1950.

EARL DE LONG,
Secretary of Kiwanis Club of Neenah, Inc.

[Mr. MCCARTHY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a booklet written by him entitled "Wanted: A Dollar's Worth of Housing for Every Dollar Spent," together with a statement regarding the publication of the booklet, and correspondence relating to the publication, which appear in the Appendix.]

HOW TO RAISE REAL WAGES—REPORT BY COMMITTEE FOR ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

[Mr. BENTON asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a report entitled "How To Raise Real Wages," released on June 14, 1950, by the Committee for Economic Development, which appears in the Appendix.]

EXEMPLAR FOR PEACE—POEM BY JAMES PATRICK MCGOVERN

[Mr. THOMAS of Utah asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a poem entitled "Exemplar for Peace," written by James Patrick McGovern, and published in the Chaplain, a journal for Protestant chaplains, which appears in the Appendix.]

WORK OF THE LADIES OF THE SENATE IN RED CROSS ACTIVITIES

Mrs. SMITH of Maine. Mr. President, I want to take this occasion to call to the attention of the Senate the fine work that is being done by the wives of the Senators in the organization known as the Ladies of the Senate on Red Cross Work.

Its 82 workers have produced 20,420 surgical dressings, 135 garments and other items of sewing, and 40 knitted garments—of which 23 were afghans—during the period of January 1, 1950, through June 6, 1950. All in all, your ladies, and I exclude myself from that designation, put in a total of 4,689½ hours on this production work for the Red Cross. I commend them to you. They are worthy of you.

I ask unanimous consent that two letters on this matter be included in my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN RED CROSS,
DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CHAPTER,
Washington, D. C., May 5, 1950.

Mrs. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Chairman, Senate Ladies Red Cross Unit,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. BARKLEY: The afghan which Mrs. Burke made for naval hospital patients was such a beautiful one that I felt I must write and tell you how much we in the chapter appreciated the thought and work she put into it. It is so good looking with the Navy anchors and insignia that we feel sure no patient will be allowed to use it as all will want to look at it continuously. This is just one of the many examples we have of the particularly fine work produced by the Senate ladies unit.

All the work of this unit is of outstanding quality. The baby clothes are the prettiest and daintiest ever made and all the sweaters and afghans are really unique. The Red Cross is so grateful for all the many little extras which your unit puts into their work of love. Our production chairman, Mrs. McKinnon, always exhibits them proudly to all of us in the chapter before sending them out, and we are continually amazed at the new designs and patterns.

The chapter also deeply appreciates the tremendous job you are doing in making the thousands of surgical dressings now requested by Naval Hospital.

We will ever be grateful to and proud of your unit, the oldest in the chapter, which has never closed its doors since World War I and has never ceased to give untold pleasure to those who turn to the Red Cross for help.

Please accept the grateful thanks of our chapter for all you and the members of your unit are doing for the Red Cross.

Sincerely yours,
Mrs. DAVID E. FINLEY,
Chairman, Volunteer Services.

MAY 19, 1950.

Mrs. DAVID E. FINLEY,
Chairman, Volunteer Service,
American Red Cross,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MRS. FINLEY: I want you to know how much I appreciate your lovely letter of May 15.

It is always encouraging to have a few words of praise for work well done and you may be sure that I shall read your letter at the very next meeting of the Senate ladies. Everyone will be just as grateful as I am that what little we have been able to do this winter for the Red Cross has been of help.

Thank you very much for taking the time and trouble to write me.

Most sincerely,
MRS. ALBEN W. BARKLEY.

REFERENCE OF RESOLUTION CALLING FOR INVESTIGATION OF THE HANDLING OF THE AMERASIA CASE BY THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has before it technically the conference report on the Hatch Act, although an agreement has been entered into to vote on that matter on Wednesday.

For several days the Chair has had before him a resolution submitted by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], and other Senators, authorizing and directing the Committee on the Judiciary to make an investigation into the conduct by the Department of Justice in the investigation of the Amerasia case and the prosecution of persons charged with violation of the law in connection with that case. The Chair has had several ideas under consideration in determining the question of the committee to which the resolution should be referred. The fact is that there is a concurrent investigation at the present time in progress by the Committee on Foreign Relations, through its subcommittee, under a resolution heretofore adopted by the Senate. It has also had under consideration the question of the action of a grand jury in New York which has for 15 months been investigating the same matter and has submitted its report.

The Chair has decided that it is not his function in ruling on a technical question as to the reference of a resolution to consider the merits of the resolution itself. The resolution, as submitted, may or may not be a reflection upon the Foreign Relations Committee and the subcommittee which is now conducting an investigation into the Amerasia case. The Chair is not permitted, in his view, to undertake to look into the motives that actuated the submission of the resolution.

The question of whether the Senate desires two concurrent investigations to be in progress at the same time on the same question is one for the Senate itself to decide and one for the committee to which the resolution will be referred to decide in the first place. Therefore, the Chair does not feel that in ruling on the question he has any right to consider or to comment on the motives of those who submitted the resolution, or on the wisdom or the folly of the Senate having two investigations going on at the same time on the same matter. The Chair cannot take into consideration an extraneous matter such as the report of the grand jury in the State of New York. The only question before the Chair is where to refer this resolution under the rules and the practice of the Senate.

The rules adopted under the Reorganization Act with regard to the reference of resolutions to committees are fairly well defined; more so than was true prior to the adoption of the Reorganization Act. The Chair has little difficulty in referring bills introduced or joint resolutions or other resolutions providing legislation. The rules are silent, or vague at least, with regard to the jurisdiction of committees in holding investigations. The basis for all Senatorial investigations and, really, all congressional investigations is the possibility that out of them will come legislation. Every committee before which legislation is pending, or even in cases where bills have not been introduced, may hold hearings on any question which may result in legislation.

The Senate is not a grand jury; none of its committees are grand juries. The Senate cannot try anyone for any offense. If there is revealed on the part of a public officer any misconduct which would justify proceedings of impeachment, such proceedings must originate in the House of Representatives; they cannot originate in the Senate. If the House acts upon a question of that sort, by way of impeachment proceedings, the matter then comes to the Senate, where the Senate is supposed to be an impartial jury to try the person charged by the House with any impeachable misconduct in the performance of duty.

For that reason, the Chair has likewise entertained some doubt as to the propriety of having the Senate proceed to investigate the conduct of public officers, which investigation might result in impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives and trial by the Senate, in which case it would be difficult for the Senate to constitute itself into an impartial jury to try the case on the evidence submitted to it.

All those things are interesting; but, in the view of the Chair, they do not have any bearing upon the technical question as to the committee to which this resolution should be referred.

The Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction over proposed legislation involving the courts of the country. This resolution directs the Committee on the Judiciary to make a full and complete investigation of the conduct of the Department of Justice in the prosecution of the Amerasia case. The resolution on its face does not necessarily seem to contemplate legislation on the subject. It provides that if any charges are made against anyone, the person so charged shall be given the right to be heard. Even in that case, no punishment could be inflicted by the Senate or by the committee which would hold the hearings. Only a report could be made to the Senate on the evidence which the committee might take.

All these things the Chair has considered; but the Chair must say that they have seemed to him not to bear upon the technical, parliamentary question as to the committee to which the resolution should be referred.

The Committee on the Judiciary, if the resolution is referred to it, has full power to control the resolution, either by reporting it or by amending it or by taking no action on it. Of course, the full Senate has the same power, if the Committee on the Judiciary should report the resolution, either as submitted or as it might be amended.

Under all these circumstances, the Chair feels constrained to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary, and does so.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have listened to the ruling of the Chair, and I think the Chair's position is sound. The resolution will go to the Committee on the Judiciary, and will have to be considered by that committee. However, for the RECORD, it might be of some value to have the Senator from Maryland make a brief statement.

The investigation into the Amerasia matter is an executive investigation. Aside from some few leaks, no one is in a position to tell what evidence has been adduced before our committee, because all the testimony has been taken in executive session. I have read numerous comments about what has occurred in the committee hearings, comments to the effect that this or that has been done and this or that has not been done; but, obviously, the persons who are making such comments cannot know what they are talking about, because they have not heard the testimony. Until the hearings are complete and until the report is filed, no one outside the committee will know what is the full testimony which has been taken before our committee.

However, in order to show the Senate and the country what has been done, in part, and without disclosing the testimony, I am going to read 12 questions which the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Maryland, put to the FBI. The FBI took charge of this case, and conducted its investigation for 3 months, before arrests were made. I ask Senators to keep in mind the fact that the investigation continued for 3 months. At one time the FBI had as many as 70 agents working on this case—in short, Mr. President, 70 agents working on a 3 months' investigation. So it would seem that the FBI would know more about this case than any other agency in the world would know.

With that thought in mind, I addressed 12 written questions to the FBI, about 3 weeks ago; and the FBI has replied in full to those questions, which are a part of our record. I shall read only the questions, not the answers, to give the Senate some idea of the scope of our investigation. Here are the questions which were submitted to the FBI, and to which the FBI replied in full:

1. Give the names of all individuals involved in the removal of confidential documents from the State Department whether innocently or not innocently involved.

In other words, Mr. President, even if certain persons were innocently involved, we want to know the name of every person who had any connection with that case.

2. How did the confidential documents get out of the State Department?

In short, Mr. President, what was the method? What was the procedure? What was the technique? We wish to know whether the removal was done openly or in secret, or what not?

3. Were any employees of the State Department detected taking confidential documents; and, if so, give the names?

4. Were any of the confidential documents given to agents or representatives of any other government? If so, give details.

5. Were any employees of the State Department seen giving documents to other persons on the outside?

6. Was there evidence of espionage? If so, give details.

7. Was evidence essential to convicting the accused obtained in such a manner as to render it inadmissable at a trial?

8. Was evidence sought and obtained by entering the apartment and premises without legal process and without the knowledge of the accused?

9. What evidence did the FBI have that could not be challenged as illegally obtained, which could be used to sustain the indictment?

10. Why were only three persons indicted?

11. Was all the evidence the FBI had given to the grand jury against all the defendants concerned?

12. Why was it advisable to accept the pleas in the fashion made in the two cases of Jaffe and Larsen?

Mr. President, none of the answers to those questions has been published. I simply present the questions to show the Senate that the subcommittee has not been asleep; that, although considerable broadcasting has been done and numerous columns have been written in regard to allegations that the subcommittee has not made an investigation, yet the answers to those questions fairly well bring out what the people of the United States want to know. They are all of the record. However, there has been a considerable amount of loose talk by persons who do not know what is in that record. If they will wait until we have finished our investigation, we will submit a report which will answer all the questions and, I think, will clear up this entire matter.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. When will the answers to those questions be made public?

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, my able colleague, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] wanted, a long time ago, not to have these hearings held in public. The Senator remembers that, I am sure. The expression used was to "take the show off the road." So we took it off the road. Everyone wanted it taken off the road; everyone wanted a spectacular circus avoided.

Furthermore, it is advisable to have the proceedings conducted in the fashion in which they have been, for this reason: There are people who have been charged with a serious offense. There are other people who are implicated. If the evidence is published from day to day, it puts people on notice of what they are going to be confronted with when they come before the committee. So for all these reasons, and for other reasons which I shall not take the time to disclose, we have been conducting our hearing in executive session, without daily releases to the press, except for certain leaks which have been made here and there—a good many of which have been totally or partially inaccurate.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator please answer my question? When does he think the answers to those 12 questions will be made public?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly I could not answer that until the committee acts on it. I do not make it public. The committee must vote on it.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it the intention of the chairman of the committee to make public the answers to those 12 questions?

Mr. TYDINGS. So far as I am concerned, everything pertinent to this hearing can be made public when we file our report.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator says "everything that is pertinent." Are the 12 questions pertinent?

Mr. TYDINGS. All these things are pertinent; yes. But let me give the Senator an illustration, merely to show the "baloney" that has been put out about this case. The committee was criticized for not calling Mr. Van Beuren, who was security officer for the OSS. We sent our investigators to see Mr.

Van Beuren. Mr. Van Beuren gave us a statement of what he could tell if he came before the committee. We already had what he could tell, and we saw no point in calling him to tell what we already knew; so, for the time being, we decided not to call him. But there was then a statement in the press that the committee was trying to turn off the evidence. So we called Mr. Van Beuren, who had made a statement in the press attacking the committee. When Mr. Van Beuren came before us, he did not tell us anything we had not known before, and he apologized to the committee for having criticized it in the press. It is all in the record. It is a sample of the kind of misinformation which has been widely spread about this case all the way through.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator answer one more question?

Mr. TYDINGS. Certainly.

Mr. CAPEHART. Why is the committee holding secret hearings on the Amerasia case when the Amerasia case has already been in court, and when no one connected with it, particularly none of the six defendants, has any constitutional right that might be protected by an executive session? Why are the hearings being held in secret?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is assuming something that he does not know about. If these men in time of war took confidential documents and passed them to the enemy, their lives can be taken. There is no statute of limitations which runs against that. It is another case where false assumptions are made with no facts to support them.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one further question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator listened to Mr. Jaffe in secret session. Mr. Jaffe had admitted stealing some 1,700 secret documents, or to being a party to it. He pleaded guilty, and a fine of $2,500 was imposed. Why is that gentleman entitled to be heard in secret?

Mr. TYDINGS. Because our entire proceedings have been in secret, and if it could be proved that Mr. Jaffe had passed some of these documents on to a foreign government or a foreign agency, his life could be taken. Does that answer the Senator? We are not here dealing with chicken feed, we are dealing with serious matters.

Mr. CAPEHART. It is an answer, but I do not think it will satisfy the American people.

Mr. TYDINGS. No?

Mr. CAPEHART. I see no reason for holding secret hearings regarding Mr. Jaffe.

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, yes; it is impossible to have half the hearings secret. Furthermore, we are trying to find all the culprits in this case, therefore we cannot put them on notice from day to day, if we are going to get information which will be vital. This is a bipartisan committee, and when we shall have completed our hearings, it is my opinion that we shall sit down to weigh the evidence. We may not agree, and we may agree. But at that time, we shall decide what is the best thing to do.

Mr. CAPEHART. I should like to suggest one other question in addition to the 12. I do not believe the Senator covered this. The other question I would suggest is, Why were they given such small fines in proportion to the seriousness of the offense?

Mr. TYDINGS. That will be covered in our report.

Mr. CAPEHART. Was that one of the 12 questions?

Mr. TYDINGS. That was one of the 12 questions, and I will read it again to the Senator, so that he may have it fresh. That was the twelfth question:

> Why was it advisable to accept the pleas (fines) in the fashion made in the two cases of Jaffe and Larsen?

Mr. CAPEHART. In just the two cases?

Mr. TYDINGS. They were the only two cases in which fines were accepted.

Mr. CAPEHART. Was there not a third one?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. CAPEHART. Would the Senator care to add a further question as to why three of them went completely scot free?

Mr. TYDINGS. That will be a part of our report.

Mr. CAPEHART. Does the Senator care to add that?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; because that is already contained in the other questions. I also asked why only three were indicted. That was one of the questions.

I should like to say that I am not going to disclose this evidence. I am not going to take part in further debate. I have already read 12 questions merely to show the Senate that we are going deeply into this thing and are evolving all the answers. The answers to the 12 questions I have just presented take up, in my recollection, about 20 or 25 pages alone, without testimony under cross-examination from the FBI men who had charge of the investigation of this case.

Mr. CAPEHART. But did I correctly understand the Senator to say he would or would not give to the people and to the press the answers to those 12 questions?

Mr. TYDINGS. I should be delighted to give them to the whole world, but I want to complete this case, which I hope we can do in the not too far distant future. Since I reached the Capitol today I have spent all morning, up to the time I was called to the floor, trying to run down additional testimony, which I hope will give the American people a full and complete picture of this thing from A to Z.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think all the American people want is an honest investigation.

Mr. TYDINGS. I want to say to the Senator that I want to give to the American people everything that is pertinent and that has any connection with this case from beginning to end without protecting anyone, without hurting anyone, but truthfully, honestly, and fairly all the way through. That is what I propose to do, within the limits of my ability, and to submit to the Senate, when the subcommittee shall have finished its work, a full report supported by evidence as to why we found what we shall have found, and I hope the committee may be a unit in the conclusions reached.

I should like to say further that there are certain things about this case which I do not like. I do not like this stolen-document business any more than does anyone else. I do not like the looseness with which many things seemed to have happened, but I think it would be inappropriate for me to prejudge the circumstances or to comment on them until all the evidence is in, and then I think the appropriate comments will follow from the evidence we have presented; and the subcommittee might even be a unit on it.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Without attempting to criticize or to precipitate discussion, I wonder to what extent the Senator and his colleagues have given consideration to the precedents established by a committee which has been widely recognized as having proceeded with great care and apparently with great public approval. I refer to the precedents established by the Truman committee, under the chairmanship of the present President of the United States, when that committee did what the Senator is now doing, in having executive sessions to develop the outlines of a case. But, having done that, and having established whether men were testifying to matters which were insupportable, the committee then in the major cases—that is, when a great public interest was involved—had public hearings, in order that, if there were conflicts in the testimony of witnesses appearing before the committee, not only the committee but all the public interested could have the opportunity to appraise them, and particularly in order that the gentlemen and ladies of the press could take it hour by hour, or day by day, as it unfolded. That was found most helpful in proving to the public that there were no hidden spots. Has the Senator given consideration to that possibility?

Mr. TYDINGS. We have. We have had nothing but public hearings of all persons who have been named, except in the Amerasia case, where the committee voted unanimously, so far as I recall, to proceed in executive session.

Mr. BREWSTER. I did not mean that. I meant that, having had the executive session, the committee might then consider the matter of sufficient public importance to have public hearings, since, with a report, it is very difficult to appraise the question.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him——

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. I may say to the Senator that I do not believe at this juncture that our public hearings are entirely behind us, and I hope he will let it rest on that base.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I do not intend to press the Senator for any information which he should not divulge at this time, but I should like, in all good faith, to raise this question with him: As the Senator will recall, in 1946 there was a House hearing on the question. The committee issued a report, but it was not until 4 years later that the transcript of the testimony was finally available. It seems to me that was unfortunate, because the transcript of the evidence gave far more information than did the rather sketchy report. Can we have any assurances from the able chairman of the subcommittee that after the completion of the hearings in executive session, and when the committee submits its report, there will be released for the information of the Congress and of the country a full transcript of the testimony taken before the committee, so that we shall not have to wait another 4 years to get the information?

Mr. TYDINGS. I think what the Senator recommends is very desirable. However, the Senator from Maryland would prefer not to pass upon the question until it is laid before the committee. Thinking a little bit ahead of time, I think there is a great deal to commend the suggestion of the Senator from California.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, is the Senator going to address any remarks to me?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I wish to obtain the floor in my own right. I want to discuss the Amerasia case for a moment. I may say to the Senator from Maryland that in the course of my remarks I may have occasion to disagree with one thing which the Senator from Maryland said.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator will do that first, I shall be glad to remain.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. With respect to the statement the Senator made as to the so-called apology of Mr. Van Beuren to the committee, I merely want to state for the RECORD that I do not care to get into a dispute about it at the moment, because the RECORD will show the facts.

It is my recollection that after the able chairman of the subcommittee had very vigorously informed Mr. Van Beuren that the chairman was zealously interested in getting to the bottom of the matter, Mr. Van Beuren said:

> Then, based upon the chairman's assurance to me that that is his attitude, I revise my opinion which I had formed in the statement I made to the press.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the point is de minimis, but it may need qualification. He said:

> Senator, if I had known beforehand what I know now, I should never have made that remark, and I want publicly to tell you that I am sorry.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, on June 15, 1950, a grand jury for the southern district of New York expired under the limitation of its original appointment, the 18 months' period having expired at that time, and on that day the grand jury made what was called a presentment, and in connection therewith various reports as to what the grand jury had reported in its presentment were current in the public press and otherwise, and various interpretations were placed upon the presentment as the information of the presentment was made available.

A rather peculiar part of its release of the information to the public press—and it may or may not be significant—is that there were only three copies of the presentment available on the day of its release for the entire press, radio, news services, and everything else. I am informed that much of the information concerning the presentment was, in fact, interpreted by the United States district attorney who had sat with the grand jury for its entire life. There was some indication in the press on the 15th and on the 16th that the grand jury had written the close of the Amerasia case; that it has investigated that case; had completely absolved everyone in connection with it, and that it had written finished to the entire case.

I was a little curious about this, because the presentment was not carried in full in the newspapers on that day. So I called Mr. John Brunini, the foreman of the grand jury. I telephoned him in New York and asked him about the interpretation of the grand jury's action which I had seen in the public press. He said he had already, on the night before, called all news services indicating his disagreement with the interpretation of the grand-jury presentment as it was generally and popularly carried. I asked him if he would send me a copy of the presentment so that I might have a verbatim copy of what the grand jury had actually said. He said he would, and he did send me a copy of the presentment.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Was the full presentment given to the press last week, or was only a synopsis of the presentment given to the press?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I am sorry I cannot answer the Senator's question. I have made diligent inquiry and I cannot find that the full presentment was given to the press. I cannot say that it was not. I do know that there were only three copies of it available to all news services, and I found no newspaper which, so far as I know, had a full copy of the presentment copied verbatim. Therefore, I think it is in the public interest that the entire presentment be placed in the RECORD, and I propose to read it for the information of the Senate at this time.

Mr. President, this is the grand-jury presentment of June 15, 1950, made by the grand jury of the southern district of New York whose life expired on that date. It is as follows:

> Whereas the undersigned constitute all the members of the December 16, 1948, special Federal grand jury of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, impaneled to inquire into espionage and subversive activities; and
>
> Whereas this Federal grand jury has heard a volume of testimony concerning the activities of many men and women, associated with or having knowledge of a continuing conspiracy against the security of the Nation; and
> Whereas this testimony and evidence have led this special Federal grand jury to certain conclusions it deems proper and important to be brought to the attention of the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the United States Government for such action as may be necessary or appropriate, the undersigned members of this grand jury respectfully show and allege as follows—

Mr. President, I hope Members will pay especial attention to the solemn language of this grand-jury presentment. It is not a lick-and-a-promise whitewash; it is not a careless statement, nor is it, by any means, a release of responsibility for any public officials finally. It says:

> The undersigned members of this grand jury respectfully show and allege as follows:
> 1. The safety of this Nation and its institutions is being jeopardized because—
>
> (a) The underground activities of Communists in this country, organized in a continuing conspiracy and using effective techniques to extend their influence beyond their ranks, have greatly increased during the last 5 years—

I call attention to the solemn statement that these activities have greatly increased during the past 5 years—> and because—

>
> (b) The Nation, confronted with an entirely new situation in its history—a situation in which for the first time the loyalty of certain of its own citizens has been diverted to a foreign ideology—has not as yet devised adequate means to combat this menace; and because
> (c) There has been and is now a concerted attempt on the part of many, both Communists and disloyal Americans aided by fellow travelers, to conceal the truth from the American people.

These solemn words are the result of 18 months of investigation by a Federal grand jury in New York, Mr. President.

> This conviction was arrived at by the grand jury after an experience in which it came face to face with the evil that is communism. Its substitution of the false for the true as the standard of judgment has introduced into human affairs a new attack on man's integrity.
> The American people cannot afford to tolerate evil of this character, particularly in their Government—

Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that this grand jury says: "Particularly in their Government"— > nor on the other hand can they deny their fellow-citizens those civil rights guaranteed by the Constitution. But among such civil rights is not the right to be employed by the Government and the people are correct in demanding that all entrusted with the welfare and safety of the country be above suspicion.

> 2. This grand jury in a presentment submitted on April 28, 1949, warned the American people against the prevalence and increase of espionage activities. It specifically stated that existing laws applicable to espionage are "inadequate and unrealistic." It stated that these laws were loosely drawn. The grand jury now repeats that such laws are riddled with loopholes. Previously it recommended that new legislation or the amendment of existing legislation be enacted promptly. The grand jury now repeats that recommendation. Such legislation—the Internal Security bill which embodies satisfactory provisions—has already been passed by the House of Representatives and is now in Senate Committee. It should be speedily brought to passage and made the law of the land.

3. The grand jury, in the same presentment, stated: "Having seen at first hand the difficulties in arriving at the truth concerning espionage violations, when witnesses have been alerted by publicized charges and countercharges, the grand jury recommends that all investigating bodies conduct their inquiries into espionage in secret." It repeats that recommendation. The latter does not imply that when such investigations are completed secrecy should thereafter prevail. It does imply that the half-public, half-secret operation of any investigatory agency is both confusing and harmful; and that no permanent good can be served unless a conclusive report is presented to the American people which will be convincing in its thoroughness and its honesty.

4. The grand jury system was anciently established as the representative of the people, to insure law and order and to protect the people against injustice, maladministration and lawlessness. The grand jury is vested with the broadest and most unlimited powers, and has no legal responsibility for its decisions, unless corruptly made, to any publice officer or to any branch of the Government. It not only can but it must conduct inquiry into violations of the Federal laws on its own initiative and, acting alone, it has the power of subpena. Where it knows evidence exists which has not been presented to it, its duty is to order such evidence produced.

The very existence of this grand jury system is a bulwark of independence. The grand jury's purpose is at once to ferret out the guilty and to protect the innocent whether the former is shielded by powerful influences or the latter is unjustly accused.

This grand jury has been surprised at the prevalent ignorance of its functions, an ignorance that apparently extends into areas where the grand jury's cooperation should be sought. The individual citizen himself in or out of the Government not only has the right but the obligation, when he has evidence of the law's violation, to present this evidence to a grand jury.

By law this grand jury expires on June 15, 1950, after serving its maximum legal term of 18 months. It believes this time limitation is wisely established, for no group should be longer entrusted with such powers. But the experience and insight which it has acquired have been valuable adjuncts in its deliberations and in the establishment of a record available to any successor grand jury.

Mr. President, here is a significant statement. I continue with the presentment:

From such experience this grand jury is convinced that a similar body should promptly be impaneled so that it can immediately equip itself with the necessary knowledge to assay all evidence of espionage and subversive activities presented to it.

Note this paragraph.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Going back to the previous paragraph, it indicates that the grand jury was of the opinion that it had not been properly instructed as to its rights, privileges, or duties as a grand jury, does it not?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think the verbiage of this particular report may lend itself to some confused interpretation. I believe, instead of saying it did not know its duties, the grand jury is saying that the public generally is not aware of the broad responsibilities and powers of a grand jury.

Mr. FERGUSON. They are referring to the right and privilege of the individual citizen to go before a grand jury, whether summoned or not summoned, rather than criticizing the court for not instructing the grand jury that it could personally go out and seek evidence even though the Attorney General did not bring it to the grand jury?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think in general that is correct, and I believe that this grand jury presentment is an attempt to say to the public that the grand jury is not a limited body, that it is not limited by any specific instructions, but is charged with a direct responsibility to investigate on its own and that the public is charged with a like responsibility to present evidence of crime to the grand jury.

Mr. FERGUSON. It also indicates to the public that the grand jury has the right to issue this presentment as well as the right to return indictments, where it finds there is sufficient evidence on which to try a man. If it does not find sufficient evidence, it has the right to make a presentment such as the one the Senator is reading, to advise the public what they might do in the future with a further grand jury, or as they may deem necessary.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I believe that is a fair interpretation.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I continue with the presentment of the grand jury. The Chair will recall the last sentence of the presentment I had finished before the question raised by the Senator from Michigan was that "the grand jury is convinced that a similar body should promptly be impaneled," and so forth. The next paragraph states:

This grand jury, therefore strongly recommends the impaneling of a new grand jury in the southern district of New York to carry on both the work which now remains uncompleted and that which will arise in the future.

5. In its 18 months, this grand jury has had an intimate insight into the operation of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and has come to have the highest regard for the efficiency, the thoroughness and the honesty with which its affairs are conducted under J. Edgar Hoover. In the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Nation has one of its most potent agencies to protect its security. The present Congress should be commended for its recent action in strengthening the hand of Mr. Hoover in this vital work.

Mr. President, the next is an important statement, and it agrees with my views based upon my experience in the past. I can testify from my own experience that I believe this statement to be utterly true, and it is something which the Congress should take into consideration.

6. The grand jury is not convinced that the Loyalty Boards established by the Government are sufficient protection against the infiltration of Communists or of the Communists-inspired into governmental departments.

I suggest that Senators read that statement, solemnly arrived at by a grand jury which has investigated this entire situation for 18 months.

I continue reading the presentment:

It is further convinced that the security of the country, is not adequately protected if a loyalty board limits its inquiry involving governmental employees to a determination of the individual's loyalty. Cornelius Vanderbilt Whitney, on his retirement as Secretary of Commerce, called public attention to this inadequacy and stated that, since all governmental departments "today deal with secret information," each and all their employees should be good security risks, and hence should be screened by standards that include "the company they keep and stability of character."

Right there, Mr. President, let me say that in this country we tend too often to miss the point of the security of public affairs by demanding that before a person is removed from a sensitive position in Government there must be produced a Communist Party membership card signed by some official. We have missed the point that the question involved is security risk which endangers the Nation, and that we do not have to go so far as to prove actual Communist membership in order to show that the Nation and some of its most sacred secrets are in danger.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point in his remarks?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield for a question.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is is not correct to say that the information which has been furnished to various Senate committees indicates that the present Communist Party technique in this country is not any longer to issue membership cards as such?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think that is true. It is my opinion, from what I believe to be authoritative sources, that for the last 3 years the Communist Party has not issued cards of membership. That is a part of their underground activity. They have destroyed most of their lists of membership, and they do not carry cards any longer. Their subversive activities are carried on without written records.

I may say, in amplification of my answer to the Senator from California, that we have public records, released just recently by at least one Government department, in which it is noted that they have examined certain people on the question of loyalty, and while they could not prove specific disloyal acts, yet the official finding of that department was that the people concerned were definitely bad security risks. Nevertheless they were put back to work, and they are on the payroll of the Government today.

We have been misled by the term—what we out in the Middle West call "hog wash" of "guilt by association." Whether those who use the term are Communist sympathizers or not in every case, it is to be noted that the guilt by association technique formerly was generated originally by the Communist Party line apparatus, and while I do not say that all who use it are Communists, by any means, it was originated by the Communists, and that is a part of their technical language.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. While of course no one should be convicted or adjudged guilty merely because of guilt by association, will not the Senator agree with me that the doctrine which as youngsters all of us were taught by our parents and in our schools and churches, that a man is known by the company he keeps, also has some validity when it comes to those in sensitive Government positions, who have had a long record of close association with Communists or Communist-front organizations?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I think the Senator from California is completely right. While a great many people have not missed that point, unfortunately apparently the policy of the Federal Government at the moment is to completely disregard the security of the country so far as it involves questionable risks, and to base the determination as to keeping people in sensitive positions entirely upon the decision whether or not they could prove the existence of a Communist card for that person; and that is entirely beside the point.

Returning to the question of guilt by association, many reputable and fine people have come to use the term "guilt by association." I wish to make it clear that everybody who uses it is not a Communist or a Communist sympathizer, but I say it was originated by and is a part of the stock in trade of the Communist line and the Communist propaganda. Often people pick up phrases of that kind without being aware of the technical origin of that propaganda and that phraseology. Certainly there is such a saying, and it has been proved correct by experience, that people are known by the company they keep. We judge our associates and judge our employees and judge those whom we trust not only from our own acquaintance with them, but in large measure by the historic company they keep.

I continue reading from the presentment:

The grand jury endorses Mr. Whitney's position and recommends that Congress study means to insure against the Government's employment of any individual who is a poor security risk; and meanwhile repeats that no citizen is invested with the right to work in Government.

7. This grand jury has been greatly disturbed by certain court procedures in recent trials concerning communism and espionage. The maneuvering of defense lawyers have not only violated the decorum of judicial procedure but have furthered the Communist objective of establishing anarchy by undermining respect for the courts. Yet in pretrial and trial hearings of espionage cases, such attorneys under existing laws are often in a position to force on the prosecution the dilemma of choice between not proceeding or proceeding at the expense of revealing information injurious to national security. This choice is particularly grave when the Nation is at war.

The grand jury recommends to the proper authorities that a competent and exhaustive study be made by legal experts to determine if this situation cannot at least be mitigated.

8. The grand jury has been shocked at the lack of cooperation shown by certain lawyers who have appeared before it as witnesses, who refused to answer questions on the ground of self-incrimination, and who disregarded their obligations as citizens to further the ends of justice. If such a position is taken by any governmental employee, he or she would be ipso facto dismissed. Lawyers are officers of the court.

The grand jury, repeating its recommendation of April 1949, urges the judiciary and bar associations to take measures to disbar lawyers who refuse to answer questions on grounds of self-incrimination before judicial bodies, grand juries, or governmental boards of inquiry.

9. The grand jury, acting on its own authority—

And, Mr. President, this is with reference to the Amerasia case—

9. The grand jury, acting on its own authority, instituted an investigation into the Amerasia case. In the time legally available to it, it has not been able to conduct as exhaustive an inquiry as it would desire. It has examined a number of witnesses, always with counsel of the Department of Justice present.

The grand jury, sworn to secrecy, may speak to the American public either through an indictment or a presentment and hence now advances the following conclusions:

(a) The Office of Strategic Service, which precipitated the Amerasia case, acted in a responsible manner.

(b) The officials immediately concerned between that time and the arrests of the six accused, acted in a responsible manner. The Federal Bureau of Investigation properly performed its duty, a duty which was not only conditioned on bringing criminals to justice, but on the equally important considerations of thwarting further crime and protecting national security.

(c) The grand jury has found no evidence that any official acted improperly in regard to the delay in the arrests.

(d) The grand jury also has found no evidence to indicate that the Department of Justice was remiss in its prosecution of the case. If laws governing espionage had been different, the grand jury believes that the prosecution procedure would have been entirely different. Other telling factors involved certain legal procedures which, if followed, might have revealed to the enemy information that it was essential should be withheld. The determination of many of the legal issues involved, in particular the admissibility of evidence, would require a long and intensive study.

(e) The number of Government documents seized is not important, save as a demonstration that precautions against their theft from governmental departments were entirely inadequate. It is important, however, that a certain number of these documents pertained to national defense and that others of a different nature, in the hands of the enemy, would have aided it.

(f) The grand jury believes that the American people have been poorly served by the compounding of confusion through disclosures of half-truths, contradictory statements, etc., in this and similar cases.

(g) The grand jury believes that, at this juncture, it would be salutary if the Department of Justice would issue a public statement of the details of its handling of the case beginning with the time of the arrests, including a complete list and description of all documents or papers found in the office of Amerasia by any Government agent or in the possession of those arrested; and the reasons for the various steps taken by the prosecution.

10. As special assistant to the Attorney General of the United States, Thomas J. Donegan has served this grand jury, as he did its predecessor, from the day of its impaneling to that of its discharge. It has always been cognizant of his high purpose, his unquestioned probity, his unremitting zeal, and his devotion to duty. His knowledge of communism and the laws relating to the prosecution of espionage and subversion is expert. The country owes him a debt of gratitude.

11. Now, therefore, the grand jury respectfully petitions the court to accept this presentment and order it filed, authorizing the foreman and the secretary of this grand jury to send copies of it to the Members of Congress and to the proper officers of the executive department of the Government, and to permit such other use as may properly be made of this document.

JOHN GILLAND BRUNINI,
Foreman.
JOHN C. KILBRETH,
Assistant Foreman.
HUGH V. DORAN,
Secretary.

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 15, 1950.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point at the conclusion of the document I have just read, the names of the other grand jurors in the order in which they appear in the presentment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Texas in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The names are as follows:

Robert L. Barrows, Joseph P. Christianson, Evelyn Zorn Dingwall, James Sumner Draper, Raymond G. Fowler, Wheeler Williams, Robert Frese, G. Leonard Gold, Henry E. Grant, Harold C. Hahn, Richard Brown Jones, Murray Kanner, Francis Keally, Samuel B. Leight, Sidney Leshen, Herman E. Nathan, Bernhard K. Schaefer, Harry Scherman, John Schreiber, Siegfried Stern.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, this document, so far as the Amerasia case is concerned, and its reference to whether or not there is anything wrong with the situation, rather reminds me of the occasion when some public officials might be looking for hidden loot in a house and they go into the hall of the house and look around but do not go any farther than the entrance hall, and they say that up to that time they have not found any loot. Such a statement, however, does not mean that there is no hidden loot in the remainder of the house.

Mr. President, in my judgment, the Amerasia case is one of the most shocking cases in American espionage history, at least in recent times. There is substantial mystery still existing about the Amerasia case, its handling, and the circumstances that surround it. I hope the Congress of the United States, and especially the Senate, through existing means, and if not through existing means, through means which may properly be provided, will actually and exhaustively go into all the ramifications of the Amerasia case, place the finger of guilt where it should be placed, and free the American Government of the suspicions which now exist with regard to this case, bring those who are guilty to the bar of justice for their actions in failing to safeguard American secrets and properly to discharge the solemn obligations of public office, and clear up this mess once and for all. I hope the machinery of the Senate, which is sufficiently powerful to do this, will function to that end.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the observations made by the chairman of the subcommittee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] at the beginning of the session today relative to the grand jury and its activities, and also in view of the observations made by the Vice President, who indicated that the grand jury had performed its service, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Iowa if one could justifiably place upon the presentment relative to the Amerasia case the interpretation which the press has placed upon it, or which has been placed upon it by the observations made in the Senate today to which I just referred? Are we not justified in drawing the conclusion that the grand jury in New York, even though it had completed its study of this case, had not left it without a shadow of a doubt, not only because of the suggestion but the admonition that a new grand jury should be impaneled with the idea that the case should be completely investigated and that the findings of the new jury should be brought to the attention of the American people?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Nebraska that there is ambiguity in this presentment of the grand jury. From a hurried or sketchy reading of the presentment, such as is always the case when it is necessary for news to get on the wires—and, of course, newspaper writers and radio commentators are not able to wait until day after tomorrow to interpret matters as they develop, but they hurry to get their interpretations on the wires or on the air—I think perhaps the presentment might lend itself to the interpretations which appeared in the public press, in view of the ambiguity of the language of the presentment. I believe that a careful reading of the presentment, even in spite of some of the ambiguities, is bound to indicate that the Amerasia case was not exhaustively examined, and that there was a direct demand by the grand jury—in fact, the grand jury stated that its life would soon expire—that a new grand jury immediately be impaneled.

In further answer to the Senator's question, I will say that I have made inquiries in various places regarding what might be the proper interpretation of the presentment. I am thoroughly convinced that the grand jury spent only a few days in inquiring into the Amerasia case—instead of 18 months, or even 1 month—and that the grand jury spent those few days in doing so with the idea of laying a basis for an investigation of the Amerasia case by a succeeding grand jury, which this grand jury in its presentment demanded be impaneled.

A moment ago I used the illustration that if a person goes into a house, looking for loot, and if he does not find any loot in the front hall, that does not necessarily mean that there is none in the basement or in the attic; and in such case, that person might properly say, "I did not find any loot in the front hall, but I did not look in the basement or in the attic." However, I believe that the Amerasia case has never had even its surface scratched by the grand jury; and I thoroughly believe that is what the grand jury meant by the presentment, in which it said, in effect, "We did not examine all of the Amerasia case. We just began to look; but as far as we looked, we did not find anything. However, we believe it should be thoroughly examined."

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Senator, and I think he has correctly interpreted the presentment and has done so in such a way that now, even more than before, the American people as a whole, including those who are specifically interested in the matter, as members of the committees involved, will not feel that this job has been concluded until a new grand jury is impaneled and until an exhaustive investigation is made by a grand jury to clear up the charges in the Amerasia case.

SOCIAL SECURITY ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6000) to extend and improve the Federal old-age and survivors' insurance system, to amend the public-assistance and child-welfare provisions of the Social Security Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey obtained the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to permit me to make insertions in the RECORD, inasmuch as I have to leave the Chamber in a few minutes to attend a meeting of the Appropriations Committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am glad to yield.
